From Spare Moments we learn the origin of the horseshoe superstition. It is claimed that the origin of the superstition that a horseshoe brings good luck can be traced back to the thirteenth century. The monk Gervaise, of Tilbury, informs us that at that time there was a kind of demon in England which appeared as a horse rearing on his hind legs and with sparkling eyes. Whenever this apparition was seen it was a sign that a conflagration would soon break out. Hence, as giving a kindly warning, this mysterious horse was regarded a friendly spirit, and the animal in general was believed to be a beneficent mystic power. A horse tooth carried in the pocket prevented toothache; it was a sign of good luck to find a horseshoe, and one was placed under the pillow of a child to cure the colic, or nailed against a building to prevent it from catching fire. This led to its general adoption as a protective symbol.

Parnell is an honorable man; being truthful as well as honorable, he could not take the witness stand and perjure himself even for the woman who surrendered herself to him, for he could not exclaim: "Shake not thy gory locks at me; thou canst not say I did it." He preferred not to hazard a defense lest too much be proved, for in such cases oft times too much may be said. Doubtless, not many months will lapse ere this man will repair the injury done, not O'Shea or Mrs. O'Shea, for they were both parties to the crime, but to his country, Ireland, whose unfortunate cause he has so cruelly injured. He will rise again, for he is not the first of leaders who has lusted after forbidden fruits, from Marc Anthony to Napoleon, from him to Grover Cleveland, and yet the injunction of the latter to "tell the truth" has ever been potential to enlist the world's forgiveness and subsequent encouragement. And such forgetfulness of duty and temporary prostration have often preceded famous works in the world's history. It is human to err, but it is God-like to forgive. The difference between Parnell and his colleagues in eminence everywhere is that while detection and exposure have turned temporary attention toward him, they are able to enjoy the rapture of their amours in safety and can join the Publicans in a denunciation of him, a sinner, while they proclaim the Pharisaical doctrine of "I am holier than thou."

Shy of Gold Coins.

New York Press: "Do you know that gold is most unwieldy of all the different kinds of money now in circulation?" said a prominent banker to a representative of the press.

"Why so?" was asked.
 "Because it is not bankable without careful scrutiny."

"How is that?"
 "Simply this. Take a greenback, a silver certificate, a gold certificate or a National bank note to your bank and it is received and placed to your credit without delay. Not so with gold. A few days ago a gentleman brought to our bank upwards of $13,000 in gold of different denominations and was much provoked because we did not receive it forthwith and give him credit for the amount the faces of the coin represented. This we could not do because the law requires that gold shall be redeemed only at its actual value. Coins carried in the pocket for any length of time naturally lose something in weight by abrasion, probably but a fractional part of a cent on a ten dollar coin, but it is a loss nevertheless, and therefore bankers cannot give credit for gold deposits until the coin shall have been weighed."

"In the case in point my friend took his gold to the Treasury Department, and was compelled to wait there nearly an hour before he could get notes for it. Every coin had to be passed through the scales and when the weighing process had been completed three coins, two five dollar pieces and one ten dollar piece, were returned to him as short in weight. Before returning short-weight coins the department stamps on the face of each a cross. The owner is left to either send the coins to the United States Mint for redemption or to again put them in circulation. Eventually the coins with crosses on their faces will go to the Mint and be redeemed at their actual value. In many instances there may be more than several cents shortage on $50 worth of coin. Business men, however, naturally object to the inconvenience, and get rid of their gold as fast as possible."

South Carolina Redbones.

"There is a singular race of people in South Carolina called the Redbones," said Senator Wade Hampton. "Their origin is unknown. They resemble in appearance the gypsies, but in complexion they are red. They have accumulated considerable property and are industrious and peaceable. They live in small settlements at the foot of the mountains and associate with none but their own race. They are a proud and high-spirited people. Caste is very strong among them. They enjoy life, visit the watering places and mountain resorts, but eat and keep to themselves."

"When the war broke out several of them enlisted in the Hampton legion, and when the legion reached Virginia there was a great outcry among the Virginians and the troops from other States because we had enlisted negroes. They did not resemble the African in the least, except in cases where Africans had amalgamated with Indians. This intermixture, which is common in the Carolinas, produces marvelous results. It takes the kink out of the hair of the Africans, straightens his features and improves him in every way except in temper. These Afro-Indian people are devils when aroused, and as slaves were hard to manage. But to return. We soon convinced the kickers against the Redbones that they were all right, and when in the first Bull Run battle they proved how well they could fight all prejudice against them disappeared." — Globe-Democrat.

A Girl's Tattooed Ankle.

A handsome daughter of a Cincinnati family left home some months ago on a visit to friends in a distant State. Her stay was protracted, and in her letters home she described the good time she was having in the society of her lady friends. She returned at last. On the second day after her arrival her mother had occasion to enter the young lady's room while she was asleep. The fond mother's eye rested with a loving glance on her sleeping child. Suddenly she uttered a scream, and before the fair sleeper was fully conscious clutched the girl's foot and fixed her gaze on the well-turned ankle. She almost fell into a faint, for on that shapely member the girl's initials were tattooed in bright red India ink. It is believed that a plausible explanation was given, but the secret lies between mother and daughter and the artist in that distant State.

Editor (to Miss Oldgirl, aged about forty): Your work shows promise, madam, but do you know that good literary work is seldom done by a woman until she is thirty or thirty-five? Several years hence you will be able to write available articles.

Miss Oldgirl (as she leaves)—That was the most delightful man I ever met.

When you get into a tight place, and every thing goes against you, 'till it seems as if you could not hold on a minute longer, never give up then, for that's just the place and time that the tide'll turn.

Being a Boy is a Troublesome Disease.

I used to be a boy once, but I seem to have got over it. Boyhood is a curious disease, but every man has to take his dose of it. He does not mind it at the time; but when his complete cure has been effected he looks back over the period of the attack and wonders if he could ever had anything so bad as that. A boy's troubles are mental. He has strange notions of life and they rattle him so that he doesn't seem to get square with matters and things in the estimation of any disinterested observer. Of course, the boy thinks that he is having a James-dandy of a time, but every one else knows that he is not.

For instance, a boy thinks it is real good fun to go to bed with his clothes on and lie awake for three hours till the old man has swallowed his sleep-coaxer and sought his downy perch. Then the boy gets out of bed, climbs out of the back window and down a rain spout, barking his shins and skinning his knuckles on the way, and walks three miles across plowed fields to steal a watermelon out of a farmer's patch. And the next day when they have watermelon for dinner at home, do you suppose that makes the boy feel sore, as it would a man? Not much. The boy has had his fun and the chances are that he'll get up and do the same old act over again day after to-morrow.

Again, a boy thinks it is fun to put an empty soap box on top of two logs and paddle himself up and down a brook where there are no lighthouses, no harbors, and not more than twelve inches of water, counting the mud on the bottom. A boy thinks it's fun to row about, too. He will get aboard a big heavy skiff, with a pair of seven-foot oars, when the thermometer indicates 90 degrees in the summer-house, and he'll pull himself around and around in a ring, and cut S's and figure 3's on the water and think he's having more fun than a Grand Army man drawing a pension.

A boy thinks it's fun to get four old bricks and build himself an oven, and then to make a wood fire in it and roast four peach-blow potatoes with the skins on, and eat them without salt. Two boys who can have unto themselves a small feast like this, accompanied by edifying conversation about the extermination of the Sioux, think they are having more fun than you or I would at a public dinner of fifteen courses.

When a boy gets over being a boy and looks back over the period of his disorder, he often wonders how it happened that he lived through it. But it appears to be pretty generally admitted by medical experts that the boyhood disease is not necessarily fatal. It does away with a few of its victims, to be sure; but they are those who are afflicted with the acute form in which 20-foot rivers appear three feet deep, and double-barreled shotguns are mistaken for Pandean pipes.

There is one form of the disease which ought to prove fatal, but for some inscrutable reason does not. That is the form which causes the patient to imagine that jewsharps, fives, banjos and horse fiddles produce music. Usually, however, they just let the disease wear itself out. It wears a great many people out, too, but no matter.—N. Y. Times.

Hard to Live With.

"Now, the best thing you can do," said the judge to an old negro who had applied for a divorce, "is to go home and behave yourself."

"Yas, sah."

"I do not see why you should not get along all right."

"Yas, sah."

"We all have to make sacrifices."

"Yas, sah, so I heah 'em say, but mighty few men haster put up wid sich er wife ez I's got. I ken stan' de common run o' wimmen, but dat pusson, jedge, is rauk pizen. W'y, sah, if she wuz er sleep, an' wuster to dream dat I wuz enjoyin' myse'f, she'd wake herse'f up an' see dat de enjoyment wuz stopped right dar. She like ter died some time ergo. Wuz mighty in hopes dat I wuz gwine ter lose her, but when she found dat I wuz pleased blame ef she didn't turn ober an' get well. She's a bad 'oman, sah."

Talking about turkeys, chickens and Thanksgiving dinners recalls the following description of a pie which was once sent by James, Earl of Lonsdale, to King George III, to grace his Christmas feast. It contained 9 geese, 2 ducks, 2 turkeys, 4 fowls (what kinds the account does not say), 6 pigeons, 6 wild ducks (the two above must have been tame), 3 teals, 2 starlings, 12 partridges, 15 woodcocks, 2 guinea fowls, 3 snipes, 6 plovers, 3 water hens, 1 wild goose, 1 curlew, 46 yellow-hammers, 15 sparrows, 15 chaffinches, 2 larks, 4 thrushes, 12 fieldfares, 6 blackbirds, 20 rabbits, 1 leg of veal, 1 ham, 3 bushels of flour and 28 pounds of butter. The whole pie weighed 576 pounds, and was carried from the Lonsdale estate to London in a two-horse wagon.

"Yes," sighed the disappointed mother, "I brought my son up very carefully and piously. As soon as he was old enough I got him to join the church, and made him give me his solemn promise that when he married he would marry a Christian woman." "And didn't he?" "No; he married one of the girls of the choir."

FLASHES.

If we had no suffering in this life nobody would know what love meant.

Every mortal must choose between two evils. He must either rust out or wear out.

The people who are always telling how tired they are of life make life very tiresome, indeed, for other people.

New Store.

Mr. Martin Manasse has recently opened a stove store at 610 J street. He has the sole agency for the celebrated Acorn stoves and ranges, which are said to be the best made. He will make a specialty of fine cutlery, and has on hand a very extensive assortment, where everything in this line can be found. He also carries a fine stock of tin and agaware, and in fact house furnishing goods in general. His store has an air of business about it, and, although Mr. Manasse has been here but a short time, he says his trade far exceeds his anticipation, and he thinks Sacramento the best town on the coast.

"Don't Believe All You Hear."

They tell a story of a man who, while traveling in a parlor car between Omaha and Denver, fell asleep and snored with such intense volume that every one in the coach was seriously annoyed. Presently an old gentleman approached the sleeper and reprimanded him.

"How do you know I'm snoring?" queried the source of nuisance.

"Why, we can't help but hear it."

"Well, don't believe all you hear," replied the stranger, and he went to sleep again.—Indianapolis Sentinel.

A traveler in the far East relates that Chinese gentlemen of quality consider it beneath their dignity to invent their own jokes. When they go into society each carries with him a collection of bon mots and smart repartees, obtained from various sources, and when he thinks the time has come for him to make a sage remark he turns over the leaves of his commonplace book till he lights on a suitable passage, which he gravely points out to his neighbor. The latter reads the passages with equal gravity, whereupon he selects from his own stock an appropriate rejoinder, which he shows the other with a bow. Both then smile solemnly, and, after many compliments, resume their conversation.

Probably the oldest timber in the world which has been subjected to the use of man is found in the ancient temple of Egypt, in connection of stone-work which is known to be at least 4,000 years old. This was the only wood used in the construction of the temple, and is in the form of ties, holding the end of one stone to another. When two blocks were laid in place an excavation about an inch deep was made in each block, in which one of these wooden ties, shaped like an hour-glass, was driven. It is, therefore, very difficult to force a stone from its position. These ancient ties are made of tamarisk of Shittim wood, the same as that from which the ark was constructed.

I was told of a singular tale of a ring while on a recent visit to the Paris morgue, writes a correspondent of Vanity Fair. For nearly 100 years a certain family of working people in Paris have ended their lives by suicide. From father to son, from mother to daughter has been handed a plain gold ring, and on the finger of each of these suicides has been found this trinket. It has been called the fatal ring, and only last year it made its appearance on the finger of a young man—the last of the race. The ring was buried with the corpse. The cupidity of not even the most grasping body finder could be tempted to the possession of this ominous golden circlet.

Ahead Again, As Usual.

Although retail dealers have been notified by all the wholesalers in the United States, that on account of the new tariff and other causes, all musical goods have been advanced at once 40 to 100 per cent. above old prices. Now take notice that, while our immense stock on hand lasts, together with a very large invoice we are now receiving from European manufacturers, on which we escaped the high duty, as well as the wholesaler's profit, Cooper's music store (always in the lead) will make no advance in prices. Address Cooper's music store, 631 J street, Sacramento, for price lists.

Three hundred and twenty-five dollars at $5 per month will buy a new cheap piano at Cooper's music store. Also, first-class pianos sold as reasonable as anywhere, at Mathushek piano agency, 631 J street.

Hereafter a commercial lunch will be served at the Café Royal, corner of 7th and J streets. This will be welcomed by the business men as the lunch will be first class in every respect, and at popular price.

Popular music at 10 cents per copy; prices elsewhere range from 35 cents to 75 cents. Catalogues furnished on application. Hammer's music store, No. 820 J street. Sole agency Chickering & Son's pianos.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO, State of California. In the matter of E. M. STEVENS, an Insolvent Debtor.—E. M. Stevens, having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in Insolvency, from which it appears that he is an Insolvent Debtor, the said E. M. Stevens is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said E. M. Stevens, insolvent debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution; and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers; and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an Assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to such insolvent to him or to any person, firm, corporation or association for his use; and the said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered, that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Hon. J. W. Armstrong, Judge of the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the Court-room of said Court, in the County of Sacramento, on the 26th day of December, 1890, at 1:30 o'clock P. M. of that day, to prove their debts and choose one or more Assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered, that the order be published in the Themis, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the day set for the meeting of creditors. And it is further ordered, that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.

Culture of Character.

It is natural that men should admire genius. It is so mysterious in its essence, so inexplicable in its methods, and occasionally so magical in its results, that it captivates the imagination and so bewilders judgment that we are inclined to overestimate its value. Young men especially are apt to fall into the error of supposing that the world is governed by intellect. In reality the masters and leaders of men have usually been superior to their fellows in the sturdier traits of manhood rather than in pure intellect. If two men live and work together, it is almost certain that one of them will sooner or later come to exercise a dominant influence over the other; but in such a case it very often happens that the subjugated mind is brighter and better stored with learning than the conquering mind. The explanation is that the world leans on character. Steadfastness, self-control, courage, are qualities which, though they may not dazzle the eyes of men, will always attract confidence and secure a following. They are qualities that enable their possessor to make a fortune or achieve a great career. Business men, for instance, understand very well that it is what one saves rather than what one makes that assures wealth. But who is it that saves money? It is he who is strong enough to sacrifice the present to the future, who has the fortitude to endure a self-imposed privation and the manhood to resist temptation. Character does not work. It is so in every field. Everywhere victory begins at home, and self-denial and self-conquest precede and prepare the way for triumph over the world. If one loves to read, if his quick and sympathetic mind is interested in many things, the danger is that he will fall into a habit of miscellaneous and indiscriminate reading, fatal to thoroughness in any one department. He who would master a profession or science must begin by giving up a great deal that he would like to know. He must say: "This thing I will know, and, therefore, that thing I can not know." Self-denial and persistence are here again the secrets of success; but those traits are of the very fiber of education. The sober faculty of judgment is certainly of the utmost value in the practical affairs of life; but it is a faculty which is made up as much of character as of intellect. Men, as a rule, are too much inclined to overlook the reaction of character upon intellect. The safe man is he who walks in the path of duty, the strong man is he who clothes himself with the strength of principle. The grandest characters have an affinity for right and truth. They succeed because they depend upon something stronger than any mere device of the intellect or any expedient suggested by the exigencies of a moment. They may suffer temporary defeat; but they follow the guiding light of principle with a faith which is wisdom. There is always more or less sophistry in temptation to self-indulgence; and the brighter the intellect the more ingeniously will it plead the cause of error. What we call the faculty of judgment is at its best simply a clear vision of the eternal verities which persist through all history and finally crush all opposition because they are fundamental and fixed necessities.

Art Appreciated.

Many interesting stories are told of the late Henry Ward Beecher's odd ways, and one that I heard yesterday, says the New York Star "man about town," is very illustrative of the character of the man. It was told me by an art dealer: "Mr. Beecher entered my gallery one day," said he, "and after looking around a little he pointed to a study of some flowers hanging rather high on the wall. "That is a picture by Miss —, isn't it?" "Yes," I answered. "Well, she is a good, earnest girl, and ought to succeed. Do her pictures sell well?" "No, I can't say they do. You see she is not very well known yet, and there isn't much demand for flower studies—almost every young woman paints flowers nowadays." "What price does she ask for that picture?" "Seventy-five dollars." "Well, I will buy it. I think it is a good picture, and I want to encourage the young woman. You must put a 'sold' ticket in the frame, and if anybody asks you who bought it you may say that I bought it because I liked it." "Then Mr. Beecher opened his pocket-book, and finding that he neither had money enough nor a bank check, tore off the corner of a bit of manilla wrapping paper, in which a pair of shoes were tied up, and converted it into a check. It was a ragged three-cornered bit of paper, with the order for payment written in pencil, but it was worth $75. We kept it quite awhile as a curiosity, and when it finally was deposited it occasioned a general smile at the bank. "I learned afterward that the purchase of the picture by Mr. Beecher and its appearance in his house resulted in considerable advantage to the artist. Mr. Beecher really had excellent taste, and exerted an influence in art matters as well as in many other directions apart from his calling."

It must be plain to any who will give the matter a thought that our store would not be thronged from early in the morning until we closed at 8 o'clock at night if its patrons did not realize the decided advantages from Tricks In Smuggling.

One of the smartest bits of smuggling I know of occurred when one of the most and handsomest diamond rings in the country—owned at present by one of our leading families—was brought in duty free. Here is the scheme: Among the steerage passengers was a respectable looking workman with a large Dutch pipe. Just as he approached Castle Garden he wrapped the diamond in a thin piece of paper, put it in the bowl of his pipe, then filled it up with tobacco. When he landed, and while the inspectors were sifting his worldly possessions, the immigrant was making various futile attempts to light his pipe, but just when about to do so he would make some remark to the inspectors and the match would go out. In a short time he was in an East Side hotel, luggage and all, whence he was soon transferred to one of the city's aristocratic abodes.

The latest diamond trick is this: Cut the buttons off your overcoat, place unset stones inside the top of the button, cover with cloth and sew them on afresh. The scheme pays for the trouble, and goes triumphantly.

I have known a case where a pair of hollow heels on a lady's shoes contained more wealth than a modern shoe store. The shoes were worn simply to come ashore with.—New York World.

Hosannas for the Nazarene.

An English correspondent of The Congregationalist tells the following story about Benjamin Tillett, the young English labor leader who has recently come to the front, and who, by the way, is a Congregationalist: "He was speaking to an immense crowd of working men, many of them Socialists, when he began to talk about his Divine Master. He spoke of what the Man of Nazareth said when He was upon the earth; he told them what the Man of Nazareth did when He dwelt among men; and he added what he believed the Man of Nazareth would do to workingmen and dock laborers were He here to day. He grew more and more earnest as he spoke of the righteousness and sympathy and unselfishness and love of the Man of Nazareth. At last a Socialist cried out: 'Let's give three cheers for that Man of Nazareth! He is the best man of whom we have ever heard!' And immediately thousands of hats and caps were uplifted, and thousands of voices joined in ringing cheers for the 'Man of Nazareth.' So 'the world moves.'"

So confident are the manufacturers of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy in their ability to cure Chronic Catarrh in the Head, no matter how bad or of how long standing, that they offer in good faith, the above reward, for a case which they cannot cure.

SYMPTOMS OF CATARRH.

Headache, obstruction of nose, discharges falling into throat, sometimes profuse, watery, and acrid, at others, thick, tenacious, mucous, purulent, bloody and putrid; eyes weak, ringing in ears, deafness, difficulty of clearing throat, expectoration of offensive matter; breath offensive; smell and taste impaired, and general debility. Only a few of these symptoms likely to be present at once. Thousands of cases result in consumption, and end in the grave.

By its mild, soothing, antiseptic, cleansing and healing properties, Dr. Sage's Remedy cures the worst cases. "Cold in the Head" is cured with a few applications. Catarrhal Headache is relieved and cured as if by magic. It removes offensive breath, loss or impairment of the sense of taste, smell, or hearing, watering or weak eyes, and impaired memory, when caused by the violence of Catarrh, as they all frequently are. A Brace of British Jokes.

Rather a good story is the following from the London Tid Bits: Some time ago a passenger on the North London railway remarked in the hearing of one of the company's servants how easy it was to "do" the company, and said:

"I often travel from Broad street to Dalston Junction without a ticket. Any one can do it. I did it yesterday."

When he alighted he was followed by the official, who asked him in a pleasant and affable way how it was done.

But the wily traveler was not to be cajoled out of his secret by a few soft words. At last he agreed to it for a substantial consideration. This was given.

"Now," said the eager official how did you go from Broad street to Dalston Junction yesterday without a ticket?"

"Well," was the reply, "I walked."

A singular disease has been called to notice by a prominent physician. It is a form of recession of the gums of the superior molars, which is said to be due to the use of tomatoes as food. Great sensitiveness is manifested along the line of recession, similar to that of an exposed nerve. The only remedy has been found to be abstinence from tomatoes. If the disease continues the teeth fall out, not usually more than one being lost in a season.

THEMIS

Vol. II.

SACRAMENTO: SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 1890.

No. 41.

THEMIS: published weekly, by A. J. Johnston & Co. Publication Office, 410 J Street. Subscription—One year, by mail, $3 00; six months, by mail, $1 50, in advance; per month, by carrier, 25 cents. (Entered at the Post Office at Sacramento as second-class matter.)

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
A. J. JOHNSTON, Managing Editor.

The Oroville Register takes THEMIS to task for its attack on the school books of this State and says: "If any teacher or pupil in this county can point out an error in the text books now used in our schools, we will be pleased to receive the same for publication. By errors we simply refer to untrue statements or misleading assertions and not to the general arrangement of the matter, faults in paper, binding, etc." Now this paper has all through its criticisms on those books distinctly asserted that as for the mechanical work on and material in them, paper, stitching, binding, illustrations or cuts and the choice of type used they cannot be improved, as they will compare with works issued by the oldest houses in Europe or America. But it is the literary part of the works that is most faulty, and most unfortunately faulty, and no intelligent reader, and he need not be much of a scholar either, can take up any one of the books and not admit that it is overflowing with errors and with poor methods of instruction. THEMIS in its very first article on this subject exposed the errors to be found in the History wherein the names and initials of many of the great men of the country were incorrectly given. Is that no fault that the present school child should hereafter know the historic persons of his country by the wrong names? Then if the history is incorrect and misleading should it not be amended before the damage is too great to remedy? But if the History is bad in its make-up what shall be said of the other books of the series that have been put together as if to puzzle the scholar and mystify the teacher? The Register knows that no teacher is going to jeopardize his or her place by giving an honest expression of opinion of the books, but will chose rather to struggle along in an effort to master the intricacies and do the best to make the books answer the purpose. We suggest that the man of the Register look at the books himself and then give an honest opinion of their worth. He cannot surpass us in our love for and devotion to our public school system and we rejoice that California is blessed beyond her sister States in the munificence of her school moneys, and it is just for that reason that we think it wrong that with the means at her disposal and her willingness to have the best the market affords she has been so unfortunate in the results of the first effort to have free school books. It would seem as if there is a hidden desire somewhere to again put California at the mercy of the book houses and speculators.

Impulse is sometimes better than reason. In science of government and political economy, reason must prevail—there is no room for impulsive action. The opponents to our measures for the protection of home industries proclaim far and wide, that the masses are antagonistic to the recent protective legislation, and base their proposition on the result of the November election. If the people acted upon the tariff legislation of the last Congress, this act was mere impulse, and not founded on any reason. There had been no time or opportunity to test the merits or demerits of the tariff bill. It could not have been known whether its effects are good or bad. The masses, if actuated in opposition to a protective tariff, are misled and bewildered by misrepresentation and falsehoods, because there could have been no practical results disclosed in the short space of one month or less. The American people, at times are easily aroused, and sometimes fly off at a tangent, but their cool reasoning powers soon return to them. Our tariff legislation may be something in the nature of an experiment which must be given a fair trial before condemnation or even criticism. There are only plain business principles involved, and which will stand or fall under the crucial tests of the laws of trade, and which do not depend on the question of emotional politics. It is a matter of history that the economic principles of protection have resulted in the benefit of the people. A fair trial of the last protective measures should be granted before condemnation. The forces of competition will soon correct any unfair advantages in the mercantile markets as well as any extortionate demands or profits among manufacturers. The reciprocity doctrine is also a great measure, and must serve as a safety valve for our protective schemes. There is one reason why our tariff reform measure may not have a full and fair trial on the merits, and that is the timid character of capital. This hue and cry against the tariff may serve to deter the investment of capital in such a manner as is contemplated by the framers of the tariff bill. Thus, it was the ultimate purpose to manufacture certain articles upon which a high tariff was placed, in order to give employment to American laborers, and thereby increase the profit of labor. But this Democratic crusade may prevent this investment, through fear of the final adoption of free trade legislation by Congress. Of course, no capital will seek an investment where it may come in direct competition with the cheap labor of Europe. Taking the history of politics in this country as a guide, it seems that during every administration for seventy years, except during war times, when the South was not represented in Congress, there has been a revolt in the political condition. The two years succeeding the advent of a new President has always resulted in an absolute change in the complexion of Congress, and the ultimate result has always been another radical change when it came to the election of a President. It is not at all improbable that there may be as radical a change in 1892, from the results just experienced.

There has been considerable discussion regarding the effect of the Federal census of 1890, on the county government of Sacramento county. The Federal census will affect the status of this county and place it in the 3d instead of the 4th class. The County Government Act of 1883 classified the counties, and the amendment of 1889 fixes the 3d class between a population of 35,000 and 50,000. Sacramento county, according to the recent census, has over 40,000 population, which brings it within the 3d class. As to the effect of this classification on the present government and the incoming officers, we turn to Section 10 of the County Government Act of 1883, wherein it is provided that the census of 1890 will become operative in the even numbered years thereafter. This would fix the date of its operation on the first Monday in January, 1892, so far as the classification is concerned, but the form of government cannot be changed until the first Monday in January following, which makes the date that could affect the county officers, on the first Monday in January, 1893. The amendatory Act of 1889, Section 165, fixes the salaries of officers of the 3d class as follows: County Clerk, $8,000 per annum; Sheriff, $9,520, with mileage collected by him in criminal cases where the same is not a charge against the county; Recorder, $7,000; Auditor, $1,200; Treasurer, $4,000; Tax and License Collector, $4,000; Assessor, $9,500; District Attorney, $3,200; Coroner, $600; Public Administrator, fees; Superintendent of Schools, $2,000; Surveyor, Justices and Constables, fees; Supervisors, $100 per month each. A careful reading of the several Acts bearing on this subject discloses the fact that none of the county officers elected at the last election can be affected by this classification or the Federal census of 1890, except the Assessor and Superintendent of Schools. The terms of those officers being four years, they will come under the 3d class during the last two years of their term. It has been thought by many that the classification under the new Federal census operates as soon as the official returns are made to the Secretary of State by the census department, but Section 10 of the County Government Act declares that no new classification occurs until one year after the first even year subsequent to the official census, which means, the first Monday in January, 1893. One of the singular features of the amendatory Act of 1889 is the fact that while the class of Sacramento county is raised, the salary of the District Attorney is reduced $400 per annum. Just what process of reasoning caused this is not apparent. Nearly all the other county officers receive increased compensation.

The executive committee for the inaugural ball is composed of the right kind of material. The success of the affair is assured. We are pleased at this, and Sacramento will again reflect honor upon herself. All the sub-committees relating to the details have been appointed, and entered upon the duties assigned. The invitation and reception committees will be selected at an early day. Care must be exercised in the distribution of these committees as the interest of the several districts of the State must be consulted, and representative as well as active men from the same, should be chosen on those committees. The ladies will now have ample time to prepare their beautiful toilets for the great occasion. It is not the costly robe that requires time, but the pretty and becoming dress that absorbs the attention. At the inaugural four years ago, the most attractive toilet was of the plainest material, but so fashioned that the gorgions and bediamonded costumes were eclipsed. Let our young lady friends understand that it is not the dress that cost "a cool thousand in France," that bears off the palm, but the plain, pretty one.

There is no department of our government dearer to the American people than the fostering care of our public schools. Intelligence is the security of the nation. Without education there is no genuine intelligence. In the selection of those who have the management of school affairs, great care should be exercised in that choice. It is one of the tenets of republicanism that our public school system is distinctively American, and must be guarded with jealous care. No one ought to be elevated to any position wherein the school question is involved, who has not a healthy knowledge of the wants and requirements of our schools. No one should be placed on school boards who will not devote his time and abilities in the direction of the advancement of education. An ignorant, selfish or designing man should be excluded from any voice in the exercise of these great prerogatives. It is too common in these days of selfishness, to use our school boards as the medium of personal aggrandizement. This must not be. On Monday next there will be an election for four directors of Sacramento's public schools. Do the unthinking people realize the responsibility attached to such an election? It is part of the history of our municipal affairs, that only a small portion of the electors take note of such elections—scarcely one-half of the electors exercise their right on such occasions. The Republican party, which is the champion of our free school system, can always, as a party, be relied on for a proper regard to our schools. Four gentlemen have been named for members of the Board of Education, who stand well in this community, and we are satisfied they will prove true to the tenets of the party in that direction. It is always safe to trust the Republican party on matters of public education. In the light of the recent assaults upon our public school system in some of the States by fusions with the enemies of the schools, we are very suspicious of all alliances outside of the Republican party on such matters. The Wisconsin election discloses how far demagogues will go, and what sacrifices they will make for personal gain, when it develops that they will even barter the schools to the ignorant foreigner to secure political preferment. Again we say, guard with jealous care our public schools.

We have read with interest the paper by General John Bidwell in the November Century, entitled "The First Emigrant Train to California." It is a graphic description of the trials incident to a passage across the continent in those early days, and strikingly contrasts with the trip as it can be made at present. The General refers to a letter written by a lawyer of the name of Farnham and published in 1841, wherein he spoke in disparity of California. We have never seen the letter referred to, but have read a book published afterward and written by this same gentleman. The General is doubtless correct that Farnham pictured California in its most sombre colors. The main portion of his book is devoted to a narrative of the sufferings of prisoners at Monterey—Americans and Englishmen—and is of historical value on that account. As a matter of curiosity we reproduce the following from the San Francisco Bulletin of July 27, 1868, which purports to give a list of the party to which General Bidwell refers, the names of whom we observe he states that he cannot now, after a lapse of forty-nine years, perfectly recall. In connection with the General's article we deem its reproduction valuable:

A correspondent sends us a list of the first regular emigration to California of 1841, and we are assured it is the fullest which has yet appeared in print. This enterprise occasioned at the time much excitement on Missouri frontiers, and accounts of it were published in several of the Western journals, as it was then considered a great undertaking to cross the Rocky Mountains and explore a new road through the snowy ranges and howling deserts south of the Columbia, the only well-ascertained points being the Great Salt Lake and the mystical St. Mary's (now called Humboldt River, so called afterward by Fremont). An interesting sketch of this 1841 adventure appeared a few months after in Chambers' Edinburgh Magazine, which seems to have been written by some one well acquainted with all the particulars, and who foretold the effects on the future prospects of California. At the period of these important events, the Western people were much excited by the different works written by Dr. Gregg on New Mexico, and Washington Irving on the explorations of tradings of Astor's fur trappers, and those of Captain Bonneville in the Rocky Mountains, the results of which were this emigration to California, and several months after that, to Oregon, and also from Texas to Santa Fe. Our correspondent says: I have just received the following information from Albert G. Thomas, now of Tehama, who formerly lived at Monterey, and is well known in that town, where he resided from 1842 to 1851.

I sat down with my old partner Thomas a few days ago and got talking of old times in California, and all that sort of thing. It occurred to us to make a list of our ancient companions in the hard journey we made from Independence twenty-seven years ago, and, Sandy, our hairs are getting gray, and we often remember those blessed old reminders of gay Monterey. I claim that we were the first regular emigrants who ever started from the States to California, and those who arrived in the country before us, dropped in by mere chance, as old trappers, whalers and sailors from the islands and Boston ships. Our party was divided into two companies, who left Independence on the 6th day of May, 1841, and we got into California on the 10th of November of the same year. The first company was headed by Robert H. Thomas, who crossed over by the way of Salt Lake, and the second was headed by William Workman, who went by the way of Santa Fe and the middle route of Los Angeles; and both got into the country about the same time.

We were all armed with rifles, and mounted on horseback, and had literally to smell our way every day of that long, hard journey of 176 days; but we arrived all safe and hearty, and nearly every one of the emigrants mentioned have either died in the State or still reside here. But I never want to cross those hard deserts and big mountains again, except on railroad; and, you bet, I shall run over to old Pike on the Fourth of July—1870-car, or mayhap on those of 1869—as I hate salt water. I have mentioned in subjoined lists those of many "foreigners," then so-called, who lived in California before my time; but several have escaped me, as I have never seen a proper list of the names of the first immigrations. You know, when Thomas and self got our ranchos up here from Micheltereno and Jimeno; this place was out of the world, and league farms to be had for the asking, but it is quite different now. The Indians, once so numerous, are all gone, and the rail cars will soon rush by our doors, and land is worth $20 per acre. The house we built at Monterey for Governor Jimeno in 1845, was one of the best jobs we ever did in our lives, for the old gentleman not only paid us well, but got us our farms without any of the trouble others had. Here is the list of our old friends:

Pioneer Companies by the overland route of the Mary's, Ogden or Humboldt river, in 1841.—In company No. 1—Robert H. Thomas, now of Tehama; Mr. Bartlett, Joseph Childs, Major Rickman, Talbot H. Green, Josiah Belden, of San Jose, Charles Weber, of Stockton, Henry Hubert, John Bidwell, of Chico, Charles Flugge, Mr. Barrett, Mr. Brolosky, Charles Hooper, Grove C. Cook, Benjamin Kelsey, Andrew Kelsey, Mr. Kelsey, all of Sonoma; Mr. Henshaw, Green McMahon; Nelson McMahon, Mr. Patten, Mr. Dawson and brother, Mr. Chandler, Michael Nye, Mr. Walton, Mr. Swartz, Mr. Jones, James Littlejohn.

In Company No. 2, of 1841—William Workman, John Roland and Benito D. Wilson, of Los Angeles, Albert G. Thomas, of Tehama, William Knight, William Gordon, William Moore, Isaac Given, Mr. Pickman, Frank Given, Frederick Bachelor, Mr. Teabo, Frenchman, Wade Hampton, Dr. Meade, Dr. Gamble, Hiram Taylor, Mr. Lindsay, Col. McClure.

There were three or four others in these two companies whose names I have now forgotten, and many on the list are still living in the State.

We suffered great hardships, and got into very tight pinches for food and water, but we made up for it when we got among the fat beef and venison of California.

In the company which came across in 1843, were: Major P. B. Reading, Major S. J. Hensley, of San Jose, Major Jacob R. Snyder, of Sonoma, William Blackburn, of Santa Cruz, James and John Williams, Isaac Williams, of Los Angeles, and two others whose names I have forgotten. This company crossed over the Pitt River Mountains and came down the Sacramento valley to Sutter's Fort, and their history is better known than ours.

When I arrived on the coast, in 1841, I found living in different parts of the country the following old American and foreign settlers:

In Los Angeles.—John Temple, Abel Stearns, William Carpenter, Richard Locklin, Mr. Vignes, William Wolfskill, John J. Warner, Mr. Williams, and Stewart and Sam, two American colored men; and really it is a good thing to see a darkey once more, as in old Missouri.

At Monterey.—Thomas O. Larkin, David Spence, John B. R. Cooper, James Watson, William E. P. Hartnell, George Kinlock and wife, George Allen, James Stokes, William Watts, Ernest Romio, from Germany, William Foxson, Mr. McVicker, William Garney, James Meadows and James McKinley, at Santa Cruz, Isaac Graham, Henry Nail, Job F. Dye, now of Idaho, William G. Chard, Jacob Majors, Peter Lassen, John Sinclair, Dr. Dickey and several others I have forgotten.

At Yerba Buena or San Francisco.—Mr. Ray and wife, of the Hudson Bay Company; Hickley & Spear, merchants; Teal & Titcomb, merchants; Sherreback & Voigt, of the hotel; William H. Davis and Daniel Sill; — Davis, blacksmith; — Andrews, carpenter; Robert T. Ridley, John Coppinger, Eliab Grimes and Mr. Johnson.

At Santa Barbara.—Daniel E. Hill, Lewis Burton, Ziba F. Branch, Isaac Sparks, A. B. Thompson, Thomas Robins, Nicholas A. Den and Alfred Robinson.

At San Diego.—William Shooks.

At Sonoma and the Bay.—Jacob P. Leese, Victor Proudon and George C. Yount, of Napa.

W. D. M. Howard and Joseph P. Thompson, of San Francisco, I believe, were after my arrival one or two years. Besides these were W. A. Richardson, of Saucelito, John Gilroy and David Littlejohn, who had lived in the country many years, and our well-known old friend Captain John A. Sutter.

SOME UNWRITTEN HISTORY.

PART XVII.

At the constitutional election, held November 13, 1849, Sacramento district elected as members of the Legislature: Senators—John Bidwell, E. O. Cosby, T. J. Green, H. E. Robinson. Assemblymen—P. B. Cornwall, E. W. McKinstry, M. Waththal, C. J. White, G. B. Tingly, H. G. Cardwell, J. T. Hughes, J. F. Williams, W. B. Dickinson.

Two of the above named Senators, Bidwell and Robinson, had been intimately connected with the organization of the city government from its inception, and Assemblyman-elect Cornwall was, at the time of his election, an active member of the City Council. Their struggle to secure a charter had been partially successful. Under its ratification, by a vote of the residents of the city, the Council had proceeded to enact and enforce ordinances. But in the collection of taxes and licenses there had been considerable friction, and the streets and levees had not yet been completely cleared of obstructions. The time was near at hand when the city should be relieved of all doubts as to the validity of the charter, and the friends of good government had friends in the Legislature, which, by the terms of Sec. 9 of the Schedule annexed to the Constitution, was to assemble at Monterey December 15th then next. The City Council again met the day after election, November 14th. Present—A. M. Winn, (President), Councilmen Rogers, Robinson, Cornwall and Chapman, and Secretary Glaskin.

A petition of residents on I street praying for its improvement was referred to Robinson and Gillespie as a committee, with instructions to report the best plan and probable cost of such improvement. The committee on printing reported that they had made arrangements to have the ordinances printed at the same rate they are printed in the office of the Alta, at San Francisco. This rate is not mentioned in the report, but three hundred copies of the ordinance were ordered printed, to be posted by the President of the Council. The Council, at its meeting, resolved to hold its further meetings at a room in the City Hotel, formerly occupied by H. A. Schoolcraft as a Recorder's office, the Council paying the owner of that hotel, John P. Rogers, ten dollars per each meeting, for room, fire and lights. The Council allowed A. C. Bonnell $16.00 for services as judge of the election, and, on motion of Cornwall, Messrs. Winn, Chapman and White were appointed a committee to inquire into the propriety and probable cost of erecting a city hospital. T. J. White, one of the committee, was a physician as well as a politician, and at this time took an active part in public affairs.

At this meeting of the City Council, November 14, it was resolved that a committee of two be appointed to select a suitable site for burying grounds for the use of the city, and Messrs. Cornwall and Rogers were constituted such committee. This was the first step taken by the city in that direction, and our citizens are largely indebted to that committee for its judicious selection, to the Council for its action, and to John A. Sutter, for a donation of the beautiful grounds now occupied as the silent city of the dead of the Capital of the State.

The City Council again met Nov. 16, and the Committee on Hospital reported that they deem it prudent and economical to build a hospital at least 20x60, two stories high, the cost of which will be about $14,000. The committee recommended that another committee be at once appointed to proceed to its construction, and that the Governor now acting in the territory be requested to appropriate half the amount of the cost to assist in establishing a hospital at the city, and Messrs. Cornwall and Rogers and Winn were made such committee. Mr. Cornwall introduced an ordinance fixing the port dues to be collected on vessels arriving at this harbor, and further designating the duties of Harbor-master, which ordinance was read three times and passed, and was signed by the President of the Council on the 22d Nov., 1849. The ordinance provided that from and after that date the Harbor-master of the city be and he is hereby instructed to collect from each and every vessel of five tons burden or over moored at the public landing of this city, the sum of ten cents for each and every ton burthen as per register of said vessel, said ten cents per ton to be paid for first landing, and the same amount to be re-collected every ten days that such vessel may remain thereafter; provided, however, that no vessel shall be allowed, under any circumstances, to occupy the public landing for a period of more than twenty consecutive days, unless from some peculiar circumstances the Council may deem it fit to make a special provision granting an extension. Steamboats landing at the city front were excepted from the above provisions, and they were charged $25 for each arrival when the steamer was of 200 tons register or over, and $10 for each arrival if the boat registered less than 200 tons. The ordinance required the Harbormaster to remove any vessel and assign a berth to any vessel in his discretion. All moneys collected by the Harbormaster to be paid to the Treasurer, and an account rendered to the City Council every week.

The City Marshal had been required to clear the public landing of all houses, shanties and tents, and he reported to the Council that he had endeavored to perform his duties efficiently, and that the occupants had agreed to move and were now in the act of moving. But there were still some obstructions to remove.

The City Council again met next evening, Nov. 17, 1849, for the transaction of business. It did not procrastinate, but rapidly it pushed forward its reforms. After allowing certain accounts for services on the Board of Election, held on the 13th, it was resolved, on motion of Councilman Rogers: That we understand the tax on personal property, so far as applied to assessments in this city has not been fully collected, therefore,

Resolved, That the Assessor of personal property be required to notify all persons occupying property subject to taxation for licenses to apply at the next meeting after notice for such license, taking the name and property of each individual, with the amount of assessment, and upon reporting the same to the Council, they will order the issuing of licenses to be placed in the hands of the Collector for collection. That if any person or persons shall fail to pay the amount assessed on presentation of his license, the Collector shall report such person at once to one of the magistrates, and upon conviction for such offense, a fine shall be entered up and collected not less than five hundred dollars.

The ordinance fixing harbor dues was taken up and passed, signed by the President November 22d, substantially as above stated in its provisions.

The City Council exercised power which it could hardly possess under laws as at present administered; for at this meeting one Surin Jenners presented a petition praying the remission of a fine assessed against him by one of the Courts for illegally occupying the public landing, which was granted. The President reported that Capt. Norris refused to accept the office of Tax Collector and the City Council thereupon proceeded to elect his successor in the person of Mr. Burlin Brown, the City Council assuming not only the power to fill vacancies in its own body, but in all other offices.

The City Council again met November 19th.

The Committee on Cemetery reported verbally that they had consulted with the agent of Mr. Sutter (Schoolcraft) who had informed them that he would donate such a place as might be selected suitable for that purpose.

Pursuant to notice, Dr. T. J. White introduced an ordinance concerning the establishment of a Board of Health, which was laid over.

The City Council at this meeting took the initiative steps towards the building of a levee, by the passage of the following recital and resolution:

"WHEREAS, it is possible, from the present condition of the weather and the waters of the Sacramento and American Fork rivers, that an inundation of some portions of the lower adjacent land to Sacramento city may take place, therefore,

Resolved, by the President and Common Council of Sacramento city, that it is expedient to appoint at once a committee of three, of which the President of this Council (Winn) shall be chairman, to inquire into the probability of such an event taking place, and the most practicable means of warding off such catastrophe, and that said committee report at our next meeting."

Messrs. White and Gellespie were appointed on the Committee.

The terrible experience of the city within the three months then next was then hardly anticipated, but its possibility was foreseen.

The City Council again convened the next day (November 20), but the Committee on Inundation was granted further time to report. The Council, however, passed the health ordinance.

The Odd Fellows and Masons about this time effected an organization to take care of sick members in distress. They had a room at the Fort, and the affairs of the Orders were in the hands of a committee—three Odd Fellows and three Masons—with one who was a member of both Orders. This committee during the winter of 1849-50 administered its trust, using funds contributed by the members of both Orders, and did much good in caring for the sick at their room rented for that purpose at the Fort.

The City Council at this meeting resolved that the City Engineer (C. W. Coote) be required to survey and make a map of the graveyard (cemetery) now in contemplation under the immediate instructions of the Committee on that subject.

This subject of City Cemetery was not finally settled and the hearing was continued till the passage of an ordinance, December 3, 1849, which ordained that from and after that date, the squares donated by John A. Sutter and H. A. Schoolcraft, south of Y street and between Ninth and Eleventh streets, shall be the public graveyard, where the bodies of deceased persons shall be buried, nor shall any interments take place in any other part of the city under penalty of $50 for each offense. That said graveyard shall be laid off in a suitable manner by a committee appointed by the President and Common Council, which shall report to the Board, and, if adopted by them, shall be final, and be recorded in the Recorder's office of this District.

That family burying grounds shall be of convenient sizes, which shall be sold for that special use, the Council reserving the right to require uniform improvements.

That a suitable portion of the grounds be set apart for and as a public plot, the graves to be uniform and not more than two feet apart. That the President of the Council shall make the deeds and deliver to the purchaser on the receipt of $10. The President of the Council to have charge of the cemetery until the election of another Common Council. That no person should be buried without a coffin, and all paupers were to be buried at the expense of the city, in graves not less than four feet deep.

At this meeting of the City Council (December 20, 1849) after discussion of the fact that the Board was not always full, some of the members not reporting for duty, it was resolved that the public good requires the attendance of each and every member at every meeting of the Council. Therefore, resolved, that whenever a member of the Council shall without leave absent himself from its meetings for three successive weeks, his place shall be declared vacant, and the vacancy be filled at the next meeting thereafter; provided, however, that sickness and other unavoidable cause for absence shall be good excuse.

At the meeting J. B. Starr, a man well-known in this city for a number of years thereafter, made application for license as an auctioneer and the application was granted.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

Hermann's Transatlantiques will be in Sacramento Dec. 5 and 6.

Between board bills and bill boards the theatrical managers have a hard row to hoe.

"Carman Silva" says that "men study a woman as they study the barometer; but they do not understand till the day afterward."

Marie Wainwright, in a magnificent production of Twelfth Night, will be seen in California next February.

Lawyer (at the theater on a first night)—I can't imagine how the piece can be drawn out into five acts. Author—Oh, that is very simple. In the first act, you see, the hero gets into a lawsuit.

There is a deal of money for the enterprising manager who will come along and announce an out-and-out, downright, old-time minstrel show. Nowadays minstrel organizations are straining painfully after artistic effects to the almost entire exclusion of the homely negro characterizations which charmed theater-goers a decade or two ago. Give us the old-time minstrel show or exclude the word "minstrels" from current exhibitions.

No less than ten members of Denman Thompson's Old Homestead Company at the Academy, New York, have been associated with the genial actor since his first hit fifteen years ago with Joshua Whitcomb. Associated with Thompson in his first efforts for fame was George W. Ryer, to whom Denman credits much of the material found in The Old Homestead. While Ryer's interest in The Old Homestead is nominal he has a veritable gold mine in The Two Sisters, a play written by himself and Thompson, treating city life somewhat after the manner that The Old Homestead deals with rusticity.

In theatricals, as in other fields, public taste is decidedly whimsical. A few years ago melodrama was the craze, then came Shakspearean revivals, followed by a veritable tidal wave of grand opera. To-day there are but two grand opera organizations in existence. Both and Barrett may be said to be the only successful presenters of tragedy, while melodrama, at least in the metropolis, is already a thing of the past. Comic opera and farce comedy are at present the great public favorites and will doubtless remain so for two or three seasons to come. Alive to the present taste, Messrs. Gilmore & Comstock of the Academy, New York, are devoting all their skill and enterprise to preparations for the production next season of A High Roller, which it is calculated will prove a revelation in this peculiar field of amusements. Barney Fagan and Bob Slavin of minstrel fame will head a host of entertainers rapidly being secured for the venture, and Clay M. Greene has already completed the literary portion of the work, which in the subject of the title will add a new and striking character to the American stage.

Book Chat.

Someone has been interviewing a country book-seller in England with an extended business, and learned from him that, while the ladies are reading a more serious line of books, Arnold, Froude and Laing, the men are taking to novel reading with a vengeance.

There has been recently published a little volume, by Edgar Saltus, which contains "The Courts of Love," "Akosmism," "The Canons of Pure Courtesy," "Fiat Nox," "The Future of Fiction," "Imeros," "What Pessimism is Not," "Arcadia," "Morality in Fiction," "Walden," "Fabulous Andalusia," "Carolling Azure," and the "Heiress." All of these short sketches have been heretofore published in magazines. They are good reading, although something of the erotic vein permeates the stories.

Through years of patient toil and sacrifice
He climbed Fame's ladder, round by round,
Nor rested till his hand had grasped the prize
For which he toiled. Self-made, self-crowned,
He stood among his lofty dreams and weighed
Their worth, together with the price he paid.

A millionaire!—he bartered love for this—
Love binds the wings of him who would arise.
He rose unfettered. Now with famished eyes
He gazes on another's Paradise.
While memory haunts him with a shy, sweet kiss.
A frightened, fluttering thing, the first, the last,
No childish voices echo through the past;
He wears his laurels, but he paid their price.

When books were few, life must have been Embittered more with pain and rue.
Time must have had a awful mien
When books were few.

And yet the sky was just as blue,
The fields were just as fair and green,
And hearts were just as fond and true.
Who knows but man was more serene,
And quicker, deeper comfort drew
From every living source and scene,
When books were few.

Professional Chat.

In a case before a Justice, one of the lawyers made fun of the other's grammar. The Court at once arose and said: "Mr. Perkins, if you air one of them what thinks grammar runs this Court you're barking up the wrong tree. If I hear any more sich remarks I'll fine you $10."

A tired-looking man applied to a country clergyman for work. He was sent to dig potatoes. At the end of two hours the minister went out to see how the work advanced. He found that the man had uncovered at least two quarts of the tubers. "Well," said the parson, "you don't believe in injuring yourself, do you?" "Oh," replied the laborer, "I work according to Scripture." "Where in the Bible can you find anything that justifies your taking two hours to dig two quarts of potatoes?" "Why this: 'Let your moderation be known unto all men.'" The minister thought this rather witty, and took him in to dinner. The moderate worker did not prove to be a moderate eater; in fact, he cleared the table. "You don't seem to eat according to your text," said the clergyman, aghast, seeing the dinner disappearing like mist before the sun. "No," replied the tired man, plying his knife and fork faster than ever, "I have another text for this: 'Whatever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might.'"

"Zach" Chandler was one of those rugged sort of men who never mince matters when they have anything to communicate. Shortly after he had assumed the Secretaryship of the Interior Department he was called upon by an applicant for official honors who was very desirous of obtaining the place of disbursing clerk—at that time held by Dr. Richard Joseph, now deceased. Mr. Chandler received the applicant with that bluntness which, aside from his inveterate use of the weed, was his chief characteristic, and after propping his enormous pedal extremities upon his desk, motioned to the man to proceed with the statement of his case. After a few prefatory remarks the would-be disbursing clerk closed his argument by saying. "And, furthermore, Mr. Secretary, Dr. Joseph is not a Republican." That was enough for "Zach," and after carefully measuring the distance from his chair to where a large sawdust-box spittoon was located, almost halfway across the room, he rose suddenly to his feet and poured forth such a volley of billingsgate that the previously intrepid applicant trembled like a leaf. "D—n you, sir," said "Zach," "don't you tell me that Doc. Joseph is not a Republican! By —, sir, he's got the indorsements of such Republicans as Allison and Morton. What good is your unsupported statement in the face of what I know to be fact. Yes, by —, Joseph is a good enough Republican for me, and what's more, he handles the money of this Department properly and honestly. Why, sir, I own a bank up in Michigan and pay a man $10,000 a year to run it, and so long as he attends to his business and runs it well, I'm going to keep him. That's the way I regard Dr. Joseph. Good-day, sir."

NOTES.

Just at present the celebrated physician and scientist of Berlin who claims to have discovered a cure for consumption seems to be Koch of the walk among the doctors.

Now that the baseball season is over the vital question with the players is whether or not they have saved out of their salaries enough of money to pay for the beer during the winter.

So the sweet pretty name of "Alice" must give way to the fool autobiography of "Alys!" Some people desire to be pushed through life without a name so other folks would never recognize them if they were hurt.

A functionary in the Russian army, who has come into considerable prominence lately, is a Jew named Baronok, whose duty it is to spy upon corrupt officers and ferret out their stealings. He is a very intelligent, honorable and impartial man.

Judging from the newspaper cuts of Mrs. O'Shea, although such pictures are always crude and unworthy, it is not at all surprising that a susceptible old bachelor like Parnell should fall in love with her. She is a winsome looking woman.

The "whereases" of the Farmers' Alliance that met in San Jose this week read like a Fourth of July pyrotechnic. But their "resolves" seem to mean business, and politicians had better make their peace with the Farmers or stand from under, for there's going going to be a row at the next election.

Labor gets to-day a larger share of the products of the land than at any time during the history of the world, and a man, to-day, is worth more, and mere capital less, than it has ever been in the history of the race. If some men, who deem it their duty to assume the functions of Providence towards the laboring man, would die, the workingman would be better off.

In the next House of Representatives of the Kansas Legislature there will be at the most only four lawyers. As the Judiciary Committee has control of changes in the laws, and it is generally acknowledged that such changes can only be made intelligently by men of technical learning, the Speaker of the next House will be confronted with a decidedly perplexing problem when he attempts to name this Committee, or there will be some laws enacted which will not stand the test of the court. In fact, lawyers are rather expecting a rich harvest as the result of coming Kansas legislation.

It is safe to assert that between this time and the close of the great Chicago Fair of 1892-3 no man in the United States will be better advertised through the country than Mike de Young, one of the Commissioners representing California. He commenced his gratuitous, self-imposed introduction through the medium of the telegraph at the very first meeting of the Commission at Chicago; and since then not a day passes that the dispatches do not tell us of the great brain work, the wonderfully original plans that evolve from that stupendous head that is destined to land its owner in the Presidential chair or the lunatic asylum. Mike is very broad across the forehead.

The following is not a chessnut, but took place to the personal knowledge of the writer of this note: A certain attorney of this city has the habit of hanging his overcoat on a nail behind his office door. Last Monday afternoon he went to the Court-house and on returning looked, as is his habit, to see that no sneak thief had taken the coat. It was gone and not to be found anywhere in the office. He had not been out more than half an hour and concluded that the thief could not be far, and therefore the best thing to do was to put the matter in the hands of the police at once so the guilty one could be detected while trying to dispose of it to some second-hand store. So off the indignant lawyer started and when at the foot of the stairs realized that he had on the overcoat. Being caught laughing to himself he explained the cause, and hence this item.

The liberty of a man out of which he gets satisfaction is a liberty that has become a part of him. If one gains proficiency in any profession or trade his liberty in his specialty is proportionately increased. The law of mechanics becomes a part of the mechanic, the law of music a part of the musician, and when performing their functions there is apparently no great effort on their part. But one who does not understand mechanics or music has not the liberty to undertake feats in those departments. When one becomes accustomed to certain lines of action there is an increase of power and liberty. Obedience to law brings happiness, for all law was meant for the welfare of man. It is impossible to escape the governing influence of law. If a being is transferred from one State to another he becomes subject to a different set of laws.

Tunisians have a rather unpleasant custom of "fattening up" their girls for marriage.

A girl, after she is betrothed, is cooped up in a small room. Shackles of silver or gold are put upon her ankles and wrists as a piece of dress. If she is to be married to a man who has discharged or lost his former wife, the shackles which the former wife wore are put upon the new bride's limbs, and she is fed until they are filled up to the proper thickness.

Of course there will be an Inaugural Ball to herald the incoming administration and make the new officials feel that they are the most popular beings on earth and to remind the outgoing that they too were similarly honored, but that now, in the gargon of the French Admiral when he toasted the American Navy: "Zey zinks zey are some, but zey cannot." In other words they were once, but now they are of and among us, of the earth earthy and like all that is human they must die. And there is the dapper young man who will begin to study how, out of his salary of twenty-five dollars a month, with his board, lodging and wash bill to be deducted from it, he is going to save ten dollars a ticket, five dollars for a carriage for himself and adored one, a dollar and a half for a pair of white kids, six bits for a four-in-hand tie, two and a half for a twenty plait shirt; the spike tail coat he can borrow, else rent at two and a half for the State shindig; necessarily breeches are included as it is the height of fashion to wear them, no gentleman being thought half-dressed without. Then there are the divinities that shape our destinies—God love them for not loving us—they, too, will be all aglow in preparation and anticipation of the four years' wonder. It will be a topic to keep the dear little brain at work from now to then. What an ocean of visions in satins and silks and velvets and laces with mountings of box and barrel plaited India gauze, crepe de chine, translucent and exceedingly iridescent; rich brocades, royal armure with Beau Brummel coat of golden bronze Kensington cloth; bonnets, two story and an attic high, trimmed with twisted cord passementerie in brown and gold recherche, cut but bias, intertwined with broche wool, Matelasse jacket en redingote style; hair pompadour and ornaments and diamonds and nothing less. Thus will appear the creme de la creme, the bon ton and haut ton of our own favored four dozen or less. Then there comes the Jenkins to perpetuate in the society column who was there and what she wore. The supper with its wind pudding and saw-dust pies that won't go half way round and costs a couple of thousands or more over the payment of which will be the usual quarrel, crimination and recrimination. Any way it is an enjoyable frolic and the people who attend get their fun for their shillings.

Won't Grant It.

The American society which wishes to excavate at Delphi, in Greece, finds that it cannot obtain the privilege of bringing works of ancient Grecian art to this country. The rulers of Greece are more clear-sighted than those of some other Eastern countries. They know that the relics have a double value on the soil of the country which produced the artists. The advancement of knowledge of ancient art and manners is important enough, however, to warrant the expenditure of considerable sums of money to receive the copies and photographs, which can be taken exclusively by the society making the excavations, and the fund required will probably be raised.

"There is a Jew!" said Rev. Dr. Blank, as he sat in his study with a Jew hater, and pointed to a plaster cast of Michael Angelo's magnificent head of Moses. "And there is another Jew," he added, as he pointed to a painting of the Veronica Christ. "And there are yet other Jews," he continued, as he glanced around his walls at the pictures of the prophets, apostles, and sages, from David and Jeremiah to Paul and Peter. "Yes, my Christian brother, these are Jews, and are they not men who have voiced the highest thought of the world for ages, and whose teaching is the guide of our life today, and who will lead mankind to the end of time?" The Jew hater had not taken full account of these things before hearing his pastor's impassioned words, which, however, set him a-thinking.—N. Y. Sun.

From the Cornhill Magazine we clip the following interesting scraps: We can well understand what puzzlement the fire was to primitive man. He could not make out its nature; was it a being, an animal, a god—or what? It is, perhaps, hardly wonderful that he associated it with life; he could not understand what caused the animal heat of the body, and as he saw that when life departed the body waxed cold, he supposed that the human frame contained an internal flame or fire. Even in an Arabian romance, Yokdan, the hero, anxious to discover what life really is, opens the heart of an animal as it dies, and discovers a little blue flame which leaves the cavity of the heart as he observes it.

He Ought to Be War Editor.

A month or two ago Colonel Bangs engaged a young fellow named Scudder as sub-editor of the Morning Argus. On the day before the anniversary of the battle of Bunker Hill, Bangs asked Scudder if he was familiar with the history of that battle, and Scudder said he was. So Bangs told Scudder he would like him to write up a little sketch of it for the anniversary day, and Scudder said he would try.

The next morning the sketch appeared in the Argus and attracted a great deal of attention. When Bangs saw it he called Scudder in and said:

"Mr. Scudder, didn't you tell me you thought you were familiar with the battle of Bunker Hill?"

"Yes, sir."

"Well, if that's the case, I will be obliged to you if you will mention to me what you mean when you say:

"By four o'clock the Confederate troops were ready for the attack. General Washington had the captains put in line to await their coming, and when Napoleon saw them he drew his sword and said: 'Soldiers, twenty centuries look down upon you!'"

"No sooner were the battering rams levelled against the walls of the castle than the Duke of Wellington sent word to his mother by General Butler that he would either win or be brought back upon his shield. Then, ordering his men to fire at the white of the enemy's eyes, he awaited the onset with that majestic calmness which ever distinguished the hero at Buena Vista."

"This was the very crisis of the battle. Joan of Arc, spying General Jackson behind the cotton bales, dashed at him on her snow-white charger, swinging her ponderous battle-axe over her head, her hair streaming behind in the wind. As her steed rushed forward her hair caught in the bough of a tree, and as she hung there Sergeant Bates shot her through the heart with a bolt from an arquebus. Her last words were: 'Don't give up the ship.'"

"The duke could stand it no longer. The Marmalukes had slain all the vanguard. General Sickles had lost his left leg and retired on a pension, and the enemy's skirmishers, lodged in the top of the monument, were pouring boiling oil on those who attempted to scale it. Leaping from a horse, he shouted, 'Up guards and at them!' And the next moment, with the glorious flag of truce in one hand and his sword in the other, he hurled his legions upon the lava beds, crushing the savage foe to the earth, killing, among others, the well-known General Harrison, afterwards President of the United States."

"I think we'll have to part, Mr. Scudder. It seems to me that your career as a journalist ought to come to an end right here. I will accept your resignation."

A Berth in Heaven for Sale.

When Thomas Cruse, the bonanza king, made the famous sale of the Drum Lumber, the news went all over the country. For a man to jump from poverty to a millionaire's affluence almost in a day, was an unusual thing even in a mining center. The result was a stream of letters to Mr. Cruse from cranks of all sorts. He remembers one of them particularly. It was from a minister in Washington. He announced that he had by some unknown means secured a good berth in heaven, the value of which was beyond estimate.

It was a "sure thing," and the minister was willing to make an affidavit to its existence. He had heard of Mr. Cruse's sudden rise to wealth, and thought an opportunity was offered for a fair exchange. He was not entirely willing to relinquish his claim on the future snap, but he offered to give half the berth if Mr. Cruse would in return send his check for half his fortune. Mr. Cruse decided that as matters looked then the minister would get the best of the bargain, and he declined to consider the offer.—Helena (Mont.) Independent.

Politeness.

It is polite to avoid practical jokes. It is polite when you have offended any one or hurt his feelings in any way to apologize for it as clearly as possible, without reservation or excuse, since the more vulgar a man is the more does he obscure and degrade an apology by self justification. It is polite to express an interest in or admiration of that which is dear to others.

It is sometimes more polite to accept a gift or a courtesy, especially from humble people, than to refuse it; and it is polite to show the utmost kindness and courtesy to those who have been reduced by adversity. And it is something more than polite to interpose and shield another person from mortification, wounded self respect and loss of dignity.

"I never was as sleepy in all my life as I was last night, but I had to stay awake on my feet till morning. But I had one grim satisfaction, at least; I was not alone."

"Who was the other victim or victims?"

"The baby; he didn't get a wink either."

Civilizers.

Much diversity of opinion appears to prevail in Europe as to the most effective method of civilizing barbarous nations. Germany seems to believe that the object in view can best be achieved by means of obsolete rifles and old muskets, while Holland manifestly considers that excellent results may be attained by gin and rum, which, notwithstanding the protests of the other European Powers, she persists in exporting in enormous quantities to West Africa. England gives evidence of her touching faith in the humanizing influences of the guillotine, seventeen of which have just been shipped to Bombay for use in the vassal State of Hyderabad. The palm, however, must be awarded to our gay and light-hearted French friends, who, realizing the fact that it is above all things necessary to render civilization attractive in the eyes of the natives, have dispatched a number of merry-go-rounds, with musical accompaniment, to the Gaboon, where they have created the most extravagant enthusiasm among the pleasure-loving blackamoors and their dusky wives.

An Ancient Custom at Yale.

In the chapel, on either side of the middle aisle, sit the dignified seniors, while in other parts are the lower classes. Away up in his high pulpit sits "Prexy" (which is the cognomen that the honorable President goes by). After the service is over a most ancient and curious custom takes place, which is both interesting and amusing to the visitor. As the President leaves the chapel he passes down the middle aisle between the lines of standing seniors, who all bow very low at his passage. It is almost funny to see the men double up and bend almost to the ground, and it is hard to repress a smile. At the end gallery, seats are reserved for spectators, and during "Prom" week, when these seats are filled with pretty girls, the point of general interest is generally that end of the chapel and not the other.

FLASHES.

When a woman can't cry, the situation is desperate.

A fellow can easily have his own way by not wanting it.

Love in a cottage is lovely, but love in a flat is too suile to last.

Many a man is called a cynic who is nothing more than a cross-grained fool.

Married people, it is said, live longer than single ones. It seems longer, anyway, to unhappy couples.

How good a man is to his wife the first day after she has caught him doing something wrong.

"Ay, there's the rub," said the girl in the kitchen, sadly, as she looked at the washboard Monday morning.

The man who never made a mistake is a son of the woman who never gossiped, and of the man who never had "the best cure for rheumatism you ever saw."

The Weather.

The highest and lowest Signal Service temperature during the past week was 72° and 39°, as against 64° and 40° for the same time last year. The rainfall the past week was nothing, while during the same time last year there was .15 of an inch. The total rainfall for this season to date is .80 of an inch, as against 8.85 inches to an equal date last season. It will therefore be seen that our present season so far is 8.05 inches dryer than last season to an equal date. On the 12th day of December last year the river reached the highest point on record, viz: 27 feet, the Payne break occurring during the evening of the same day.

Dr. Gill's Botanic Cough Syrup is a guaranteed remedy made in Sacramento. Will relieve the most troublesome cold almost instantly. Try it.

Mathushek Pianos are the best. Twenty years' test has proved it.

In 1266 a pig was burned at Fontaneya-Roses, near Paris, for having eaten a child. In 1386 a judge of Falaise condemned a sow to be mutilated and hanged for a similar offense. Three years later a horse was solemnly tried before the magistrate and condemned to death for having killed a man.

A country in which "paper money" is not worth its face is a good country for investors to keep away from. Two or three years hence, however, Argentine or some other South American "boom" country will probably be able to unload a few more hundreds of millions of dollars worth of securities on the guileless foreign capitalist.

Physicians always order beef for invalids that is cooked very little, in order that none of the nourishment in the meat may be dried away. Lean beef ground in a machine, salted to taste, made into cakes, and broiled just enough to heat, is excellent for invalids to whom the doctor has forbidden vegetables. A person in health may suit his taste.

There is a tradition among the Persians and the Jews of Eastern Palestine that the old patriarchs and people in general had three eyes, one in the back part of the head, prior to the time Moses was given the law on the tables of stone. On that eventful day, Moses commanded his followers to turn their faces from Sinai. This they did, but took care to uncover the other eye, which Moses commanded to henceforth be forever closed.

A writer in Longman's Magazine, says that an invalid friend of his was amused for six consecutive days by the antics of robins, which came regularly at 10:30 A. M. and fought a duel on the lawn outside his window. The combat invariably lasted until one became too exhausted to recover his legs, whereupon the victor would seize him and triumphantly drag him about the inclosure.

Mrs. Mushroom: "It is a queer thing, Sophie, I've been all day searching the stores for an escutcheon, and I don't think there's one in town. I heard Mrs. Startup say that the Montagues boasted about their unvarnished escutcheon, and I ain't a goin' to let the neighbors get ahead of me. I'll have an escutcheon if I have to send to Yurup for it, and what's more, I'll have a varnished one, too."

Twins Not Appreciated.

Don't you give any premiums for twins?" asked the anxious-looking man who had edged his way through the crowd up to the front of the railing behind which sat the judge at the baby show.

"No, my friend," replied one of them. "We have thought it best not to offer any premium for twins. Here is the premium list. You can see for yourself."

"I didn't know but you might have a consolation purse to offer," said the anxious-looking inquirer, edging his way out of the crowd again.—Chicago Tribune.

Ahead Again, As Usual.

Although retail dealers have been notified by all the wholesalers in the United States, that on account of the new tariff and other causes, all musical goods have been advanced at once 40 to 100 per cent. above old prices. Now take notice that, while our immense stock on hand lasts, together with a very large invoice we are now receiving from European manufacturers, on which we escaped the high duty, as well as the wholesaler's profit, Cooper's music store (always in the lead) will make no advance in prices. Address Cooper's music store, 631 J street, Sacramento, for price lists.

Three hundred and twenty-five dollars at $5 per month will buy a new cheap piano at Cooper's music store. Also, first-class pianos sold as reasonable as anywhere, at Mathushek piano agency, 631 J street.

Hereafter a commercial lunch will be served at the Café Royal, corner of 7th and J streets. This will be welcomed by the business men as the lunch will be first class in every respect, and at popular price.

Popular music at 10 cents per copy; prices elsewhere range from 35 cents to 75 cents. Catalogues furnished on application. Hammer's music store, No. 820 J street. Sole agency Chickering & Son's pianos.

Stockmen's Liniment. For rheumatism and neuralgia, sprains and bruises its effect is magical. Both the above for sale by Kirk, Geary Co. and J. Hahn & Co.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY OF Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of E. M. STEVENS, an Insolvent Debtor.—E. M. Stevens, having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in Insolvency, from which it appears that he is an Insolvent Debtor, the said E. M. Stevens is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said E. M. Stevens, insolvent debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution; and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers; and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an Assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to such insolvent to him or to any person, firm, corporation or association for his use; and the said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered, that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Hon. J. W. Armstrong, Judge of the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the Court-room of said Court, in the County of Sacramento, on the 26th day of December, 1890, at 1:30 o'clock P. M. of that day, to prove their debts and choose one or more Assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered, that the order be published in the Themis, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the day set for the meeting of creditors. And it is further ordered, that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.

A LUCKY LADY.

MILAN (Tenn.), Sept. 23d. Mrs. G. W. Combs, of Humboldt, Tenn., a former resident of this place, has recently fallen heir to half a million dollars left by her Scotch grandfather. She has forwarded proof of her relationship to the lawyers and will receive her inheritance to-day.—Evening Mail and Express, New York, Sept. 23, 1890.

We are Mrs. Combs' lawyers, and by her seeing our advertisement became the agents of her good fortune. We have a number of similar claims in our hands and expect to gain them. If your ancestors came from the old country, write us, and inclose 25 cents for a reply. There are more than half a billion dollars in Great Britain alone, unclaimed, which rightly belong to people in the United States.

Short and Sharp Answers.

Robert Hall, even when insane, did not lose his wonderful power of repartee, says Cassell's Saturday Journal. An insincere condoler once visited him in the asylum and said, in a hypocritical tone: "What brought you here, Mr. Hall?" Hall touched his forehead with his finger and replied: "What will never bring you, sir—too much brain." The extreme sensitiveness of Thackeray to criticism is well known. He once said to Douglas Jerrold: "I hear that you have been saying that 'The Virginians' is the worst book I ever wrote. 'I never said anything of the kind,'" said Jerrold; "I said it was the worst book that anybody ever wrote."

A lady who lived near Thomas Carlyle kept Cochon-China fowls, and the crowing was so intolerable a nuisance that the philosopher sent to complain of it. The lady was indignant. "Why," she said, "the fowls only crow four times a day, and how can Mr. Carlyle be so much annoyed at that?" "The lady forgets," was the characteristic rejoinder, "the pain I suffer in waiting for those four crows." The old nurse of James I. having followed him from Edinburgh to London, entreated him to make her son a gentleman. "My good woman," said the king, "I might make him a laird (landowner), but I could never make him a gentleman." "They tell me, Sir John; that you like a glass of wine," said George III. to the commander-in-chief of Ireland. "Those who have reported that fact," replied Sir John Irwin, "have done me great injustice; I like a bottle." The Duke of Norfolk, who was much addicted to the bottle, asked Foote, the actor, in what new character he should go to a masquerade. "Go sober," was the instant reply.

A young officer complained to Napoleon that he had been six years a lieutenant. "I served seven years in that grade," was the answer, "and it has not prevented me from making my way." Napoleon was, at one period of his career, a great economist. He said, between St. Cloud and Paris, to Lauriston: "Why does not the carriage go faster?" "It would," answered Lauriston, "if more oats were allowed."

The transition from Napoleon to Wellington is easy. On one occasion the duke was in imminent danger of being drowned at sea. The captain of the ship at bedtime came to him and said: "It will soon be all over with us." "Very well," answered the duke, "then I shall not take off my boots." At some party a lady of high rank asked him whether it was true that he had been surprised at Waterloo by Napoleon. "I never was surprised till now," was the characteristic reply.

A Man's Opinion of Women.

A man's opinion about a woman is always curious, so I asked one the other day if a woman in front of me, whom I had been admiring for an entire block, was not what I call a pretty woman.

He said, "no;" and when I asked him why, he answered me thus:

"She is not pretty, because her hair is in disorder, and a man likes a woman's hair to look smooth when she is on the street.

"She is not pretty, because there is a line of black under her eyes to enlarge them, and a man likes a woman to have a clean face.

"She is not pretty, because she is conscious that she is attracting attention, and a man likes a woman to be so lady-like on the street that she passes by unnoticed.

"She is not pretty, because her hat is an exaggeration, her lips are padded, and because a man likes a woman to be real, and strongly objects to bizarre headgear.

"She is not pretty, because she doesn't walk well; she minces one moment and trots the next, and a man likes to see a woman a little slow and dignified in her movements.

"She is not pretty, because her mouth is too big, and a man had rather have a woman with no mouth at all than one with one that seems adapted solely for electioneering purposes.

"She is not pretty, because she is bad form, and if you were a man you would have seen that at once and would have passed her by as undesirable." So much for the opinion of a man.

Again I render thanks that I am a woman. BAB.

The Moslem abhor bells, which they say draw evil spirits together. In place of them they have men called Muezzins, stationed in their minarets, who call out five times each day for the people to come to prayer.

The Pope does his private writing with a gold pen, but his pontifical signature is always given with a white feathered quill, which is believed to come from the wing of a dove.

Wedding Superstitions.

The Romans deemed it an ill omen to meet certain animals while on the way to have the ceremony pronounced. A dog, cat, lizard or serpent were extremely unlucky animals to meet upon such occasions. A wolf, toad, ox or horse were lucky. In Greece the groom is sprinkled with water on leaving home to meet his future bride. The bride must visit the oven in company with her father and mother if she would have a happy married life.

In France, during the Middle Ages, a ring woven from straw, or one made of horse-shoe nails, was placed on the bride's finger at the conclusion of the marriage rite. The couple also stood in a ring 5 or 6 feet in diameter made of mistletoe or straw.

In China, a girl who is partaking of the last meal she is to eat in her father's house previous to her marriage, sits at the table with her father and brothers only; but she must not eat over one half of the bowl of rice set before her, otherwise her departure will be followed by continued scarcity in the domicile she is leaving. In Scotland it was formerly particularly ominous to meet a funeral while on the way to be joined in wedlock. The bride or groom was certain to die soon, as the sex of the person being taken to the graveyard was male or female. The Swedish bride seeks to catch a glimpse of the groom before he sees her, hoping thereby to gain the future mastery. She also places her foot before his while the ceremony is being performed and sits down first. While the words are being said she stands near the groom, so that in the future no one will come between them.

In Britany if the wife hopes to rule she must take care that the ring, when placed upon her finger, shall slip at once to its place without stopping at the large second joint.

In Russia the bride must not eat of the wedding cake unless she wishes to lose her husband's love. If a dog belonging to the family of the bride should howl on the day of the wedding, or the day previous to the event, he must be shot by the father of the bride and no one else, and, besides that, with a bullet made from a silver rupee.

In his address before the property defence league in London, Mr. David Dudley Field strongly declared that socialism can never become prevalent, and that no matter how fiercely society may be shaken it will reassert itself in the face of all irrational systems. He also took ground against the nationalist doctrine, asserting it as his conviction that the State ought not to provide work for the people nor furnish them with bread, clothes, houses or lands.

or overeating, or the partaking of too rich and indigestible food, is a common cause of discomfort and suffering. To immediately relieve the stomach and bowels from such overloading, a full dose of Dr. Pierce's Purgative Pellets is the best remedy. They operate gently, yet thoroughly and without griping, nausea, or other unpleasant effects. If the too free indulgence in such intemperate eating has deranged digestion, causing dyspepsia and biliousness, attended with a sense of fullness or bloating after eating, coated tongue, bitter or bad taste in mouth in the morning, on arising, drowsiness after meals, indescribable feeling of dread, or of impending calamity and hypochondria—then you need to follow up the use of the "Pellets" with Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, to tone up the stomach, invigorate the liver, and set all the processes of digestion at work. While curing indigestion, it purifies the blood, cleansing the system from all humors and blood-poisons—no matter of what name or nature, or from what cause arising. There is nothing similar to it in composition or approaching it in results. Therefore, don't be duped and induced to take some substitute, said to be "just as good," that the dealer may make a larger profit. Manufactured by WORLD'S DISPENSARY MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, Buffalo, N. The admission of Wyoming to statehood recalls the pioneer days of woman office holding in that unique civilization. Hester Morris was the first woman appointed a justice of the peace in the United States. In those rough pioneer times the bowieknife and pistol oftener settled disputes than did the court of justice. Mrs. Morris was a tall, Elizabethan type of woman, with as rugged features and as brusque a method of expression as has been ascribed to the English Queen. Her first case in a Wyoming Court, says the Spokane Spokesman, concerned a quarrel between two young men, who were brought before her armed with bowie-knives and pistols. She had known them since their boyhood, and, in spite of the fact that a scene had been expected on her first appearance, a few words of motherly advice to those who had known her kindness and a native little mother wit carried the day. After that there was no more trouble. She was a particular "terror" to a certain class of evil-doers. Men who had been arrested for beating their wives or for general drunken disturbances of the peace invariably pleaded not to be brought up before "Old Judge Morris." They wanted to be tried by men.

The car was crowded to the doors,
They hung on by the straps,
And children sandwiched in the throng
Sat on the women's laps.
Still the wild conductor took them on,
Till, crushed down in the brunt,
E'en as he died his last words were,
"Please move up there in front."

Miss Rattler—Well, Bobby, if you are a very good boy, Santa Claus may bring you a new watch next Christmas.

Bobby (disgusted)—New nothin'. I heard papa tell mamma the other day that he'd let Santa Claus have his old watch for me. He's the fellow that'll get a new one!

He sat and looked at the busy editor for about fifteen minutes steadily. Finally he yawned sleepily and remarked: "There are some things in this world that go without saying." "I know it," snapped the editor, "but there are too darned many things that say a good deal without going."

The bottom facts will in the long run come to the surface concerning every man. The public can be deceived for a time, but as sure as the sun shines the truth will triumph, and every man will, like Judas, "go to his own place."

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
A. J. JOHNSTON, Managing Editor.

Andrew Carnegie, a Pittsburg capitalist and one of the autocratic iron kings of the Keystone State, in 1881 wrote a book which he called "An American Four-in-hand in Britain." He printed a few copies for especial friends, and later (1888) gave it to the public. It is quite apparent from the tone of his book that he is more Scot than Briton, more Briton than American. It may be that large wealth has a demoralizing effect on its owner. He is apt to sink his own manhood in his property, and he gives it a prominence which relegates him to a secondary position; however talented he may, be Mr. Carnegie is no exception to this rule, if such it may be called. Instead of making his trip quietly on foot or by easy, short stages through England, observing things as they were, noting its peasantry, its architecture, its farms, its manufactories, schools, and the many things that go to make the prosperity of England greater than that of any other country, he started with a flourish of trumpets in a hired coach with English horses and a London driver. His stopping places were selected by a courier and the entertainment of him and his friends was princely. His intercourse was with the aristocracy and those whose services were given for his gold. We do not propose to follow Mr. Carnegie in his trip from the Grand Hotel, Brighton (June 17, 1881), to the Caledonia, at Inverness, his old Scotch home (August 3). But we do wish at this time to call public attention to some of his comparisons between England and the United States as maritime nations to point our remark that he is more Briton than American, and to show that the policy which our government shall adopt ought not to be framed by such as he. To illustrate his idea of British superiority he introduces a fable, whether from Æsop we cannot say, and with it he couples a sneer at Americans. He says (p. 12) "one cannot be a day at sea without meeting the American who regrets that the stars and stripes have been commercially driven from the ocean. This always reminds me of a fable of the lion and the turtle. The lion was proudly walking along the shore, the real king of his domain, the land. The turtle mocked him saying, 'oh, that's nothing. Any one can walk on land. Let us see you try it in the water.' The lion tried. Result: The turtle fed upon him for many days. America can only render herself ridiculous by entering the water. That is England's domain."

"Her home is on the mountain wave,
Her march is on the deep."

He speaks of the Americans as foolish in thinking of building a navy to compete with England, as in case of war they must speedily fall into the hands of England and go to swell the superiority of the better appointed navy.

On this subject how far, as a matter of policy, our government should go in building a navy to compete with those of England, France, Germany, Russia and the South American States may well result in a wide difference of opinion. There is at present no war cloud visible in our political horizon. We have a population of 63,000,000 people and we do not depend for any necessary on any country. We are or may easily become, wholly self-supporting. England is the only European government which has a considerable colony on this continent, and her hold on Canada is very slight. The military and naval stores of England, along the St. Lawrence and at Vancouver can hardly be considered as a menace to our government. England, in charge of a Tory Ministry, might submit to our government the sharp alternative, surrender Mason and Slidell or we will declare war in aid of a rebellion, which of itself threatened our existence as a nation. But England, with our government united, will be much more careful of its threats. War with England would mean that whatever hold England had on Canada would be loosened. Queenstown, Quebec, Montreal, Victoria would fall to the United States. The 35,000,000 of population of the British Isles could no more compete for supremacy on this continent against our 65,000,000 than could we invade England and reduce her to subjection. In the event of a war between the United States and England the latter would not be left with a coaling station within menacing distance of our shores. England understands this, and we can never be in danger from her. She has too much to lose and too little to gain by a war with us. Such a war would sweep these seas of her shipping and relegate her political power to her island home, the fortress of Gibraltar, her Indian rule and her loose hold on certain parts of Africa. But the question still remains how far ought we to compete with her in the manufacture of ships of war and the establishment of a merchant marine. This will form the subject of a future editorial.

Something must be done to avert the absolute destruction of our forests. So great has been the devastation that many of the most common woods have become almost extinct. The destruction has already made it necessary to seek other materials for many of the uses which wood has hitherto subserved. The finer woods are becoming scarce and, for ornamental purposes, are classed among the luxuries. Veneering is an enforced process of economy in consumption. Hard woods, which were not many years ago commonly used for fuel, are now in demand for high priced furniture and interior house-finishing. The woodman who would not spare his trees, now has few trees to spare; and, still heedless, he spares them not now if he is offered their present price.

That able independent journal, the Pittsburg Dispatch, uses the following language in regard to protection: "The Republican party is completely committed to the policy of protection as outlined in the McKinley bill. A party cannot discard its policy and convictions like an old shoe, and for it to attempt to do so at the first hasty expression of popular disapproval would be to confess itself a humbug, and to declare itself utterly unworthy of trust. Wholly apart from the merits of the protective policy, there is much more wisdom and honesty in the position that the tariff act has not had a trial; that its results cannot be judged until it has been in operation at least a year; and that the party must stand by its deliberate acts until their impracticability is demonstrated. From an interview with Congressman Niedringhaus, of St. Louis, it will be seen that this gentleman, who is more famous for foresight as a manufacturer than as a statesman, is not at all uncertain as to the future of tin plate manufacture in this country. He has placed a large order with Pittsburg firms for machinery, and will put a tin plate factory in operation at the earliest possible moment. His previous experience in tin manufacture gives him confidence in the future of the industry, and he is not, like some more ambitious Western legislators, inclined to throw up his hands at the first adverse breath, before the actual effect of the tariff is understood. This is the only way to secure the growth of manufactures under the protective policy. If manufacturing enterprises are to be abandoned every time an election goes the wrong way, protection cannot accomplish any expansion of our industries."

There is nothing of a backdown nature in President Harrison's message. It is a clear and positive, as well as able State paper. The acts of Congress on the great political and economic questions are approved and praised. The labor of the International American Conference, which was the creature of the present administration, comes in for commendation. Our foreign relations, in detail, are discussed and the situation is satisfactory. The question of the beet sugar industry is a pronounced success, which must be gratifying to our Pacific coasters, as this is a very favorable locality for its production. The protective measures must have a fair trial, and no amount of abuse or misrepresentations shall prevent a fair test of its operation. The reciprocity clause in our tariff laws, is considered at length with approval. One subject engrosses the President's attention, and that is the means of securing fair and honest elections. He is firm in his advocacy of legislation upon this question, so as to insure a fair expression of the voters at all elections. Federal Supervisors of Congressional elections is a necessity. The silver question is another important measure which he discusses, and approves the action of Congress thereon. It will take time to ascertain whether all that is hoped for on the silver question can be accomplished. The recall of Minister Mizner was something of a surprise, because it has been tacitly understood that his action in the Barrundas affair had the approval of the Department of State. It is probably best, however, that the President has recalled the Minister, for the reason that there has been much clamor in that direction. The fact that the immense revenues of the country have been collected and disbursed without a single defalcation being reported, is certainly a great improvement in the economic administration of the government.

We have said in the past, that all alleged reform movements result in Democratic victories. The Farmers' Alliances, while they may have some cause of complaint, do not form an exception to the above sentiment. It is a significant fact that these organizations have taken foundation in Republican States, and the results of the recent election develop that Democrats only were successful in securing the Alliances' favors. If these organizations are strictly non-partisan, the developments of their actions do not disclose that fact. Every Congressman elected through this power—and it is a power in the land—is claimed as a partisan Democrat and counted with the Democratic majority in Congress. We do not hear of a Farmers' Alliance in the Southern and Democratic States—that is, not to any formidable status. As another evidence that the leaders of these movements are using the Alliances as partisan, and anti-Republican, we observe that an edict has gone forth from the Alliances councils against the measures before Congress to secure fair elections. This act discloses a real partisan character. The cause of complaint by the farmers can be easily adjusted in the Republican councils; in fact, the free coinage of silver, their principal demand, is a Republican measure, and has always been antagonized by the Democratic leaders in Congress, not excepting the late Democratic administration. It is only a question of a very short time that the beguiled Republicans who have embarked upon this Alliance crusade will realize the fact that it is only another means of aiding in securing Democratic success.

A Terrible Ordeal.

An officer of the French army, during the reign of Napoleon, having incurred the suspicion or resentment of the Emperor, thought it expedient to take refuge in one of the Austrian provinces, and here he became initiated into a society, the object of whose formation was to assassinate Napoleon. One day a letter was brought to him, containing the usual signs and passwords of the society, and requiring him to repair, on the following night, to a secluded spot in the forest, where he would meet some of his associates. He went, but he found nobody. The orders were repeated four times. The officer sought the appointed place with no better success than at first. On the fifth night of his appearance at the rendezvous, after waiting for some time, he was on the point of returning when loud cries suddenly arrested his attention. Drawing his sword he hastened to the spot whence they proceeded, and was fired upon by three men, who, on seeing that he remained unwounded, instantly took to flight, but at his feet lay a bleeding corpse. He was yet bending over the dead man, when a detachment of chasseurs, summoned apparently by the noise of the pistols, came up suddenly and arrested him as the assassin. He was loaded with chains, tried the next day, and condemned to die. His execution was ordered to take place at midnight. Surrounded by the ministers of justice, he was led at a slow pace, by the light of torches and the funeral tolling of bells, to a square, in the center of which was a scaffold environed by horsemen. Beyond these were a group of spectators. The victim mounted the scaffold, and his sentence was read, and the first act of the tragedy was on the point of fulfillment when an officer let fall a word of hope. An edict had just been promulgated by the government, offering a pardon and life to any condemned criminal who should disclose the members and the secret tokens of a particular association of which the Frenchman to whom these words were addressed had lately become a member. He was questioned, but he denied all knowledge. They urged him to confess with promises of additional reward. His only reply was a demand for immediate death—and his initiation was completed. All that passed was a terrible trial of fidelity. Those who surrounded him were members of the society, and every incident that has been described was only a step in the progress of the fearful ordeal by which the society sought to determine the trustworthiness of the neophyte.—N. Y. Ledger.

"The London Pump Court," which usually tells good stories, but not very often new ones, says that Justice Maule once addressed these words to a defendant in the presence of the jury which had convicted him: "Prisoner at the bar, your counsel thinks you innocent; I think you innocent; but a jury of your own countrymen, in the exercise of such common-sense as they possess, which does not appear to be much, have found you guilty, and it remains that I should pass upon you the sentence of the law. That sentence is that you be kept in imprisonment for one day, and as that day was yesterday, you may go about your business." Lord Ellenborough says: "Pump Court" had before him at one time a young counsel who had a hard time in beginning his speech. He became much embarrassed and said hesitatingly, "My lord, the unfortunate client who appears by me—my lord, my unfortunate client—" The Justice interrupted him with the remark, which did not prove encouraging: "You may go on, sir; so far the Court is quite with you."

Poetry is sometimes personified by the word muse, and it is from these goddesses that poets generally are supposed to get their inspiration. Some writers tell us that the Muses are always connected in some way with running water, and it is well known that in German mythology music and water have a close connection. There is no question but there is great inspiration in the music of water as it babbles and murmurs over its stony bed, and we all know how delightful it is to listen to a waterfall through the woods. One writer says: "The rivulet is also the favorite haunt of the poet; its quiet murmur induces calmness over the spirit and puts the mind into a frame adapted for the reception of poetic images." The following lines from a well-known English poet point also in this direction:

Such sights as youthful poets dream
On summer eves by haunted streams.

So it is very probable that the Muses were originally the naiads or nymphs of the springs, and it is easy to see how the poets came to speak of the Muses as inspiring their writings.

ROMANCE OF THE ELECTION.

Thirty-nine thousand seven hundred and fifty-four dollars! That was the bill of Martin B. Brown for printing 14,000,000 ballots used at the recent election in this city. It was a mere fraction of the total cost of the election, and the romance of the story of the work done does not lie in these figures, however they may be regarded as large or small. The unexpected obstacles which were overcome, the rapidity with which the work was done; the ingenuity displayed in printing consecutive numbers by using ordinary type, and yet furnishing better work than the patent machines could supply at a cost insignificant compared to the charges the machine makers proposed; the extraordinary distribution of all their tickets among nearly a thousand polling places without a single error; the quick invention and manufacture of a new "plant" necessary to this work and useless for any other kind; and finally, as Mr. Brown himself generously puts it, the faithful and suggestive and untiring help he had from old subordinates, makes a romance I wish I had the full ability to write up so that everybody besides practical printers could comprehend it. But in order to make the story clear to the general reader I shall have to omit some technical details which would be of interest to printers.

The first problem that was forced upon Mr. Brown grew out of the fact that the framers of the Ballot Reform law were neither printers nor paper makers. They designated a size and form of ticket which was unsuitable for any size of paper which had ever before been manufactured or kept in stock. Mr. Brown early discovered that fact, and he at once had a paper especially manufactured to print twenty tickets to the form or sheet. There was a job to start with! A large quantity was needed of this particular size in a short time. It was to be of a size not in common use, and not likely to be wanted again for a year, at least, or by anybody but the "City Printer." So haste and irregularity of size had to be paid extra for. Of this paper, made "for this occasion only," 1,200 reams of 50x30, weighing sixty-five pounds per ream, and 120 reams, 24x38, weighing forty pounds per ream—the whole weighing thirty-nine tons—were used in this job. A ream measured about six inches in height; consequently, if the 1,320 reams had been piled on top of each other the pile would have been 675 feet high, or three times as high as Trinity steeple. These large sheets had to be cut into twenty pieces each, of the size of the legal ballot. If these could have been piled up the top would have been lost in the clouds, over two miles and a half above our heads!

The next problem was thought to be a more difficult and more costly one to solve; but it proved to be neither. The lawmakers, in order to surround the ballot with every security possible, had made provision for the consecutive numbering of tickets. It was at first thought that this could be done only by the application of twenty Wetter machines to each of twenty presses to be used, a process which would have been very costly. Mr. Brown ingeniously devised another method. He had twenty sets of "slugs" of numbers from 1 up to 99 made from type very nearly like the type required by the law; and with these he printed the numbers consecutively in the following manner: No. 1, for instance, was set up twenty times, and the first form of twenty tickets was printed 947 times, thus giving a No. 1 numbered ticket for each polling place in the city. It was necessary to print in this way up to 1,200 numbers and to print the number on the entire edition of 1,136,400 large sheets before any other step could be taken. The numbers had, therefore, to be changed in the forms on each of the twenty presses used 1,199 times. Then these numbered sheets had to be carted to three large lofts rented for the purpose and there sorted by girls who had worked in book binderies into other bundles so that each of the 947 bundles contained sheets consecutively numbered on both sides from No. 1 to No. 1,200.

But the changing of the "slugs" was nothing compared to the changes necessary when it came to printing the tickets and their indorsements. The changes were multitudinous! To read the list of them would be far more tedious than the perusal of Homer's record of the Greek navy in the original tongue. There was, of course, a change for each of twenty-four Assembly districts, but the presses had to be stopped 947 times to make the changes for the various election districts in each Assembly district. But all that was simple enough to Mr. Brown and his men. But the Aldermen's and Congress and Judicial districts were composed of parts only of several different Assembly and many election districts; and some person had to watch those presses and order changes at exactly the right time to prevent the blunder of printing the names of Congressmen, Aldermen and Judicial candidates on the tickets of districts in which they were not running.

I wish I could describe the more intricate of the mechanical appliances which were invented to facilitate this work, but Mr. Brown proposes securing patents on them, so I must not divulge or dilate. One was a new form of chase, or block, rather; small, easily handled and rapidly locked and unlocked by a peculiar ratchet—all manufactured at Mr. Brown's foundry. Of these twenty each of two different sizes were used in each form on twenty different presses, making necessary the manufacture of 560 new blocks, of no probable use for any other than this work. A thousand wooden trays 54x35x8 inches had to be made to hold the large sheets as numbered, each tray holding 1,200 sheets. Several tables, seventy-five feet long, had to be built on which to handle these sheets. The type for each ticket had to be electrotyped in several parts, and there were several thousand of these plates. After the sheets were cut down to the size of the tickets—it required nine cutting machines to do this work—they were made into 9,470 bundles of 1,200 tickets each, and then had to be placed in cardboard covers, tied with twine, and india-rubber bands to the number of 50,000, properly directed to the polling place at which they were to be used, and then being bound with tape were sealed with Mr. Brown's seal. This work of distribution to the police stations was performed as a matter of necessity on Sunday. It took all day to do it. It also took twenty large furniture vans with a policeman to guard each, to perform it. And it was afterward found that not a single error had been committed.

Mr. Brown is always spoken of and sometimes cursed at as the "City Printer." He is occasionally accused of having a "pull" and a "monopoly of city printing," through every change of local administration. This romance will explode this fancy. He hasn't a "pull" or "monopoly;" he only has a "plant." I doubt if there is another printing establishment in the city which can print "The City Record," for lack of the peculiar plant Mr. Brown has. I am sure no one can do it as economically as Brown can do it, not having the great plant he owns. With the addition he has recently made to this plant, he can certainly underbid anybody hereafter for the election printing—that is, if the law is not changed, and the plant he has made for this election is not thereby rendered useless.—*N. A Scholarly Politician.

Henry Cabot Lodge, who has for some years been very prominent in Massachusetts politics, is still very young—only 40—considering his achievements. He was graduated in the classic course at Harvard at 21, and was at the law school three years later, being admitted to the Suffolk county bar the year following, though he never practiced regularly. He received the degree of Ph. D. from Harvard in 1875 for his thesis, the "Land Law of the Anglo-Saxons." He for some time edited the North American when published in Boston, and afterward the International Review, and was the author of various works, including lives of Alexander Hamilton and Daniel Webster. He has served in the State Legislature, also in Congress. He now represents Boston in the House, in the character of the scholar in politics. At one time he was independent in opinion and action; but he has fallen back into routine Republicanism. He claims descent, I believe, from Sebastian Cabot (son of Giovanni Cabot, or Gabotto, the Venetian navigator, who was born in England and discovered the coast line of this continent, at the close of the fifteenth century. The Cabot name has been widely perpetuated, and is likely to be, Lodge's mother being Anna Cabot, and his wife Anna Cabot Mills, daughter of Rear Admiral Charles H. Davis. All who claim the Cabot blood by descent or marriage are very proud of it, and, after the Bostonian fashion, plume themselves immensely on its possession. One of the stories told is that some of the Cabots of this generation have been recognized in Venice by their resemblance to the portraits in the ducal palace of their distinguished ancestor, which is remarkable if true.

Congressman-elect Daniel Lockwood, of New York, who is in the field for the Speakership of the Fifty-second Congress, says the Chicago Post, was an orator long before his rhetoric helped carry Grover Cleveland aloft. Away back in his school days at Hamburg he was an orator of such note that he was chosen valedictorian of his class. He prepared for the event by ordering a new pair of shoes. Late in the afternoon of the great day the shoes came. But, good heavens! they wouldn't go on. Dan hadn't another pair fit to use. He summoned the shoemaker to a conference, and, while the perspiration rolled off his face, he explained the situation. "That's nothing," said Crispin, "get a couple of eggs and break one into each shoe." Dan did so, and the result was charming. He went into those shoes like a duck's foot in the mud. His valedictory was the greatest effort of Lockwood's career up to that date. The words were honeyed and the gestures were graceful as a snake swallowing a frog. All his friends and relatives were spellbound. But right in the midst of it the author stopped. Agony was incarnate in his features. His hair rose on end. He became pale and red in turns. What was the matter? Had he forgotten his speech? No; he had just thought of those two egg omelets, and would have given all he had, or ever hoped to have, for a chance to laugh.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

The Swedish singer, Mlle. Sigrid Arnoldson, is coming to this country for the season of 1891-92, to sing in Italian opera, under the management of Fischhof, of Paris. She will be supported by a full Italian company and will appear in Romeo et Julietta, Mignon, The Barber, Massenet's Manon Lescaut, Lakme and Gounod's Mirville and other operas.

The ups and downs of American life were forcibly illustrated at the performance of Beau Brummel in Washington, in which Ethel Chase Prague took a minor part. The President and various Supreme Court Judges, members of the Cabinet, Senators, etc., with their families, were critical spectators of this young actress, whose grandfather was a Chief Justice of the United States, whose father was a Governor, Senator and Major General, and whose mother was an acknowledged leader of society for a quarter of a century.

Shakespeare's women seem to have stepped, with full equipment, out of Nature into the breathing world. They are more complete, more rounded, more emphatic, because idealized, than actual women, and are, from their idealization, more real, more individual than those. They have a wide range, great variety; are indeed of every grade—from queens to rustic wenches, from dominant minds to sentimental vacuities, from embodiments of devotion to creatures of gossamer fancy. But they are all women in every fiber of their being, in every pulsation of their hearts. In their worst and best passions; in their cruelties, injustices, vagaries, strengths, frivolities and weaknesses, the thread of sex, however twisted or tangled, is never lost. Shakespeare knew as no other poet or philosopher has known, that every inconsistency and contradiction may be found in woman, and that her variation is limitless.

We take the following extract from the lecture of Mrs. Kendal, the noted English actress: "A complaint is constantly being made that the moral tone of 'The Drama' of the present day is not so high as it should be—but for this playgoers are to blame, for they run after notoriety, and notoriety alone. This may seem a strong accusation, but is it not true? This, I maintain, never was in the old days, and proves today the degradation of our stage. Some critics hold that men and women cannot properly act noble and virtuous characters unless they themselves have led spotless lives. I do not go so far as this; but I do maintain that it is pleasanter to think that when the curtain has fallen, and the actor or actress is at home, he or she leads, or is capable of leading, the same kind of life the representation of which has moved an audience to sympathetic tears. And certainly it can be no drawback if, while admiring the artist, the playgoers can at the same time respect the man or woman. Surely, then, it is more than a necessity that actors and actresses of every position who have the true interest of their noble art in view, should make their lives an example to those with whom they are associated and to those who are to come after them. By this means, and by this means only, can the theatrical profession expect to maintain its dignity and to secure the high position it should hold in the estimation of the public. It behooves actors and actresses of every degree, while cultivating their talents to elevate and amuse, to lead such lives that those who have regarded the stage with a suspicious eye will at last give it its proper place in the world of art."

Miss Frances Power Cobbs, author of many books and one of the ablest of literary women, is, at the age of seventy, hard at work both as a writer and a reformer. She is full of health and vigor, which she attributes to her simple diet and regular habits, and gives much time to the Antivivisection Society in London, of which she is President.

"M. Guy de Maupassant was never guilty of over-indiscretion," says the Scots Observer in a sketch of this French writer. "Almost alone among those who follow the profession of letters, he endured a rigid apprenticeship. In his youth he sat at the feet of Louis Bouilhet; he drank wisdom at the lips of Gustave Flaubert. He observed life and nature with the devotion and single-mindedness of a student of painting; he made innumerable pochades, which were mercilessly criticised by his master. A high ideal was set before him. A painter learns to grasp the picturesque element in what he sees, to realize at a glance how a scene would compose on canvas, so M. de Maupassant was taught to view the world from the standpoint of literature, and, disregarding their philosophic or moral essence, to think of all things in terms of his own medium. His unique education was fruitful of result. It prevented him from displaying his talent in the making. When he first came before the public as a writer of prose he had already acquired the finished grace of a master."

Eugene Field gives the following anecdote of Carlyle: Mme. Venturi has made public several most interesting reminiscences of the famous old bear. The best of these is an account of a visit paid by a German to the house in Chelsea. This German (an unknown admirer of the philosopher) had come all the way from Weimar to see and talk with Carlyle, and he was ushered up into the study ('twas called the "silent apartment") by the servant, who having recently come to the house, did not know the rule that Mr. Carlyle was never to be disturbed when at work. The German brought a letter of introduction from some one; this letter Carlyle received with icy coldness, not even favoring the visitor with a look or a glance. Having read the letter, Carlyle simply remarked, frigidly: "Well, sir, proceed." The visitor, greatly embarrassed, expressed regret that he had called at an unfortunate time, and added that perhaps it would be better for him to retire and come again at some more convenient season. Carlyle made no answer, but arose and bowed, as much as to say: "Good day to you." The poor German, deeply humiliated, sought to withdraw from the great man's awful presence. The study was in the shape of an octagon, and there were numerous large cupboards therein, the doors of which closely resembled the main door of the apartment. In his confusion the visitor laid his hand to the knob of the door of one of these cupboards and (as the door was locked) he wrenched the knob off. Discovering his mistake the poor man tried the next door with the same result. Then it was that Carlyle pointed to the right exit, thundering out: "That, sir, is the door!" So terrified was the German that he actually ran out of the house and fled precipitately down the street. Meanwhile Mrs. Carlyle and Mme. Venturi were in the drawing-room. They heard the noise and knew that something unfortunate had happened. Mrs. Carlyle was in great terror, for she was always in mortal fear of her husband. Down came Carlyle in a mighty passion, and as he strode into the room he cried out, passionately: "What have I done that God Almighty should send a d—d German all the way from Weimar for no earthly or human purpose but to wrench the handles off my cupboard doors." The picture of the philosopher's wrath and the tragic intonation of his utterance struck Mme. Venturi as most comic and she laughed heartily. Thereupon Carlyle turned upon madame and asked with bitter scorn: "And pray what does this little lady find to laugh at?" Mme. Venturi answered: "It really does appear to me to be an exceedingly undignified interference with human affairs on the part of the Almighty to dispatch even the most insignificant citizen of Weimar all the way to London on so very paltry a mission as that of wrenching off the handles of anybody's cupboard doors." The humor of the incident just began to dawn on Carlyle, and presently he laughed as heartily as madame had laughed before. Then it was that Mrs. Carlyle, who had been shivering with affright, asked her husband whether the poor German was not, after all, a lunatic. "Nay, Jeanny," answered Carlyle, "I believe the poor soul is at least as sane as meself!"

It is related of Queen Elizabeth that it was her delight to tantalize her courtiers during the Christmas season by donning an unusually stiff and wide ruff, and standing under the mistletoe. It was upon one of these occasions, that Bacon, having remarked that it was a pretty ruff on the Queen, Shakespeare replied that it was "also pretty rough on the court."

"I have discovered," said Hook one day to a policeman on Fleet street—"I have discovered one thing that no miser will keep." "What is that?" asked the bobby. "Christmas," replied Hook. The policeman wrote this jest out, and managed to sell it before Hook had time to offer it elsewhere. It was this that led Hook to give up cracking jokes with the guardians of the peace.

A perplexing suit, involving professional secrecy, has been before the Paris Society of Public Medicine. A suburban practitioner called in to attend a patient suffering from scarlet fever, advised the landlord to disinfect the house. This was done, and the landlord sued the patient to recover the cost. The patient thereupon sued the doctor for breach of professional secrecy, and it is thought that he will win his case.

Lamb was awakened early one Christmas morning by a noise in his kitchen, and on going down to that apartment, found a burglar doing his spoons up in a bundle. "Why d-do you s-s-s-t-t-teal?" he asked. "Because I am starving," returned the house-breaker, sullenly. "Are y-you re-re-re-really ver-very h-hung-hung-gug-gery-hungry?" asked Lamb. "Very," replied the burglar, turning away. "Pup-pup-poor fuf-fuf-fellow!" said the essayist. H-here's a l-l-leg of L-L-Lamb for y-you." And so saying, with a dexterous movement of his right leg he ejected the marauder into the street, and locking the door securely, went back to bed. The burglar confessed afterward that he didn't see the joke for six weeks.

"Col. Ingersoll," says one of his friends to a New York Sun reporter, "keenly realizes the fact that he can never have a career in politics, legislation, or statesmanship, and can never hold any important office under the government for which he fought. There is no party that would dare put up the speech-making infidel for office, or that would vote for him in any election; and he knows it. Do you suppose he could be nominated or elected as Governor, or Congressman, or Alderman? All the powers of society would be turned against him if he were put up, as he knows. There are other infidels in office, but not one who has made his infidelity conspicuous. Ingersoll could not get a thousand votes in New York, and he knows it."

The great Dan Voorhees, of Indiana, and the equally great, if not so celebrated, Joe Mann, of Dannville, once defended a man charged with murder, in Edgar county. This case was a serious one for the defendant, and Voorhees and Mann exhausted their talent in his defense, with scarcely a hope of successfully proving his innocence. The trial was long and bitterly contested; the jury was out for hours, and finally this verdict was read in Court: "We, the jury, find the defendant not guilty." As the reading of the verdict broke the stillness of the Court-room, Voorhees sprang to his feet, seized Mann by the arm with a clutch that nearly took a piece out, and in a hoarse, commanding whisper, said: "Come on! Let's take a walk." They left the Court-room and walked in silence down the street for some distance. Then Voorhees stopped, laid his hand on Mann's arm, and said, impressively: "Joe, you're a good citizen, and I believe if justice is done you you'll get to heaven. We are told that in that land of perfect peace and rest there shall be heard such music as mortal ear has never heard. Sweet tones will ring on every side; grand bursts of song will rise from myriad happy souls in praise of their Redeemer; murmuring melody will float along on every balmy breeze, and exquisite music will everywhere and forever thrill the ecstatic senses of the blest—but, Joe, in that heavenly land you will never hear a sound so sweet to human ear as the utterance of these words: 'We, the jury, find the defendant not guilty.' Now let's go and take a drink."

TWO BRILLIANT WOMEN.

Lola Montez and Adah Isaacs Menken—Their Remarkable Intrigues—Their Careers in California—Downfall of the King of Bavaria—Suicide of Shipley.

O most delicate fiend!
Who isn't can read a woman?

"Brilliant, but Erratic" was the heading in large type to an article in a San Francisco journal that had reference to a woman who figured on this coast, yet who has been in her grave over twenty years. The subject was Adah Isaacs Menken. It seems now that a New York millionaire has just added to his collection of photographs two hundred portraits of The Menken, and it would appear from the dispatch that this remarkable woman did belittle herself by posing often before the camera, yet it may be pardoned for she had the combination of brains, beauty and eccentricity. After the years that have passed since the grave closed over her, one of wealth is gathering up these photographs. If he does this that he may pay proper respect to the brilliant, but erratic woman criticism adverse could not pass. It would appear, however, from the dispatch that he esteems two of them priceless, and presumes they may bring handsome sums from gentlemen of distinguished literary reputation—Swinburne and Dumas. Years ago Swinburne posed with The Menken at Paris before a French photographer; a few days later the photographs were on sale in Paris; in London he suppressed their sale and the matter was presumptively ended. The dispatch anticipates that Dumas third may be interested in their suppression, that his father, the great dramatist and novelist of France, had permitted himself to be photographed when The Menken's curly head reposed upon his shoulder.

The woman, however, can be called great. She was born in New Orleans, June 15, 1835. Her father was a Spanish Jew, and her mother a native of France. At 20 she was a ballet dancer, at 23 a tragedienne. Her first husband, whom she married at the age of 24, was Alexander Isaacs Menken, the last two of whose names she carried throughout her life. He was a musician. While respecting his name she deserted him soon after their union. Her next love was John C. Heenan, the "Benecia Boy"—the John L. Sullivan of his day. She married him in New York, April 3, 1859. They soon quarreled and Heenan deserted her. This was at the height of Heenan's success as a pugilist, and while he was preparing for his great fight with Sayers it is said she appeared in New York theatres billed as Mrs. John C. Heenan. After her divorce from Heenan she married R. H. Newell, the author of the famous Orpheus C. Kerr papers that were published extensively during the early years of the war. He exacted from her a promise that she should quit the stage, but she kept it not, and in July, 1863, she sailed for California where she played Mazeppa and The French Spy. This caused her separation from Newell, and after a successful season here—an engagement that netted her over $30,000, she sailed for Europe. In this State it was that her attachment was conceived for James Barkley, a gambler, and he sailed with her. In London The Menken toasted such distinguished personages as Dickens, Swinburne, Charles Reade, and others not less distinguished. She was then at her zenith, but the ending came soon. She returned to America in 1865 to be divorced from Newell, and the following year to marry Barkley. They, however, soon quarreled and she returned to Europe to play in Paris. Dumas second was her fond admirer, and her play was attended by Napoleon III. However, it came that when death laid his hand upon her in that city on August 10, 1868, she was penniless and alone. She is buried in a cemetery in France and over her grave is a monument erected by Barkley that carries an inscription she requested should be engraven upon it, terse, though expressive—"Thou Knowest."

Another feminine character, more distinguished than The Menken, and who was still more prominent in California, was Lola Montez, born in Ireland, in 1824, according to some accounts; according to others, she was born in Scotland, and was the illegitimate daughter of a Scottish officer. Her mother was a Creole, who had successively lived with or had been married to natives of Spain or Great Britain. Lola was well educated and married an officer named James, whom she accompanied to India. Leaving him, she led an adventurous life in the capitals of Europe. In 1846, when she appeared in Munich as a ballet dancer, she captivated Louis I, the King of Bavaria, and exercised so great an influence over him that a minister was dismissed because the King demanded she should be made Countess of Landsfeld. However, in the same year she received that title; but in 1848 violent outbreaks occurred, the King was obliged to discard Lola, and she fled the country. Without a divorce from

James, in 1849 she married an English officer named Heald, but soon after deserted him. In 1852 she came to the United States, and gave performances in New York, New Orleans and San Francisco. While in this State she located in Grass Valley, purchased a piece of ground and reared upon it a beautiful cottage. She surrounded herself with pets, among which was a cinnamon bear, and of others, birds and dogs. She also had her flower garden. She was noted for her charity, particularly to the Indians. At that time Grass Valley was more populous than now, and men of rank paid their respects to Lola. She respected those who respected her. In 1854 a young man named Henry Shipley became editor of the Grass Valley Telegraph, and while handsome and intellectual, an enmity arose between Lola and him. In the first part of November, 1854, a party of singers gave a performance at Grass Valley, and they were assisted by Lola. On November 14th Shipley published in his paper a severe criticism of their performance, and on the 21st of the same month printed an account of a shooting affray that had occurred in a saloon, and beneath it the following:

SPAIN.—The special correspondent of the New York Times speaks in harsh terms of the present condition of Spanish affairs, and thinks they have taken a retrograde march. He says that "discord and intrigue" reign behind the Madrid cabinet. Christian Majesty must turn an "own correspondent" and an occasional contributor to that press which she kept gagged. But I doubt if she could earn her bread by her pen if deprived of her notorious character. There is such a Lola Montez-like insolence and bare-faced hypocrisy in her lines that the ex-King of Bavaria might be delightfully mystified with them. But she tried to prove too much at all; just like a London auctioneer, who, illustrating the great advantages of an estate on sale, declared in a recent advertisement that "There are 600 acres of cover, and the pheasants, partridges, hares, wild fowl, snipes and woodcocks blacken the air."

When the Telegraph made its appearance that day Lola became incensed, and armed with a horsewhip started to find Shipley. She met him in a saloon and used her whip upon him. That afternoon Shipley published his version of the affair, and of course painted it in colors most creditable to himself. The next day Lola printed a lengthy reply in a newspaper published in Nevada City and under the editorial management of Aaron A. Sargent. Her reply concluded with these words:

"This morning, November 21st, the newspaper was handed to me, as usual. I scanned it over with little interest—saw two abusive articles, not mentioning my name, but, as I afterward was told, had been prepared by the clever pen of this great statesman of the future, and present able writer, as a climax and extinguisher to all the past and future glories of Lola Montez. I wonder if he thought I should come down with a cool thousand or two, to stock up his fortune and cry, 'Grace, grace?' This is the only attempt at blackmail I have been subjected to in California, and I hope it may be the last. On I read the paper, till I saw my name in good round English. The article will be in the minds of all the readers of this newspaper, of my barefaced hypocrisy and insolence. Europe, hear this! Have you not found me too truthful, too bold to say this? Has not the hypocrisy been on the other side? What were you thinking of, oh Alexander Dumas, Beringer, Mery and all my friends, when you told me my fault lay in my too great kindness? Oh, friends, you knew not that Shipley lived and breathed; that his fiat had gone forth to the four parts of the world, and he had judged me at last to be a hypocrite! To avenge you all I collected the Woman's Rights Convention, took the benefit of Miss Lucy Stone's principles—bonnet on head and whip in hand; that whip which never was used but on a horse, this time to be disgraced by falling on the back of an ASS. I went forth, strong in the principles, as I have said, of Lucy Stone and other strong-minded females, found this redoubtable man-on-the-shoulder, and as quick as a flash of lightning laid the said whip on his shoulder and head four times, on my word of honor, before my enemy could remember that he was sitting on a chair. The lady of the Golden Gate saloon was sitting on one side, a gentleman on the other. After giving him four good whippings, he got up and squared himself on the most approved Yankee Sullivan principles, and was preparing to give me a stunner in the eye. The spirit of my Irish ancestors (I being a kind of three-quarter bred of Irish, Spanish and Scotch) took possession of my left hand, and on the most approved Tom Iyer principles, before he could attain my eye I took his, on which, thanks to some rings I had on at the time, I made a cutting impression. As usual, this would-be great shoulder striker ended the combat with certain abuse, of which, to do him justice, he is a perfect master. Sic transit gloria Shipley! Alas! Poor Yorick."

Before her advent at Grass Valley, Lola married P. P. Hull, in San Francisco, in 1853. We have been told that her relation with him terminated within twenty-four hours, and that their honeymoon trip was by steamer from San Francisco to Sacramento. An account of that marriage was published in the San Francisco Alta, in 1874, as follows:

Of the twenty persons who witnessed the marriage of Lola Montez to P. P. Hull, in October, 1853, as far as known, only two survivors remain—L. R. Lull and H. J. Clayton. The few who were privy to this arrangement were determined to keep it a profound secret in their own breasts.

Near midnight, previous to the morning when the ceremony took place, P. A. Brinsmade, R. B. Hampton, Captain McMichael, and Fred. Woodworth dropped into Clayton's restaurant, on Commercial street. "Clayton, we have got a secret, a Masonic secret, for you," Clayton replied: "I am not a Mason; I often wished I was; still, if it is a secret worth keeping, I can keep it." The Colonel then said: "It is given out to-day that Lola Montez is to be married to Pat. Hull, in the Mission church, to-morrow at matin bells. We wish you to be there, but it must be kept a secret, for we do not know that it will come off, and we may all be sold."

When Clayton went home that night, he said to his wife, "I wish you would wake me early in the morning, for I want to walk to the Mission before daylight." Mrs. Clayton asked: "Why in the world do you want to go to the Mission so early?" Clayton told her he wanted to walk there, and if he waited till after daylight somebody would come along and ask him to ride, but he wanted to walk all the way. Mrs. Clayton said: "Well, you go to sleep; I'll wake you."

In the early morning Clayton rose, and, walking all the way, reached the Mission at sunrise. There he found from fifteen to twenty persons waiting listlessly outside and near the old church, walking around, as if waiting for something. He recognized them all; but Governor Wainwright (whose wife, the only lady besides the bride present on the occasion,) was the first to speak, and asked:

"Clayton, tell me what brought you out here so early?"

Clayton—"I came for a walk."

Gov. Wainwright—"Why did you want to walk to the Mission?"

Clayton—"I have tried often, but somebody would ask me to ride. This morning starting early, I succeeded."

Gov. Wainwright—"I believe you are lying to me."

Clayton—"For what? Why should I lie about coming to the Mission?"

Gov. Wainwright—"Well, I want to tell you something secret. You see a lot of people about here; they are all in the secret."

Clayton—"What is this great secret?"

Gov. Wainwright—"Promise me faithfully you will never tell, provided it does not come off. You see, all these people have been told that Lola Montez and Pat Hull are to be married here at 6 o'clock this morning. But we have about come to the conclusion that we are sold."

Just then the carriage, driven from the Adams House, Bush street, containing Lola and Hull, A. Bartol and L. R. Lull, came in sight. Arriving at the church door, the party alighted and entered through the front door; Wainwright and wife and Clayton passed in through a side door, and met the party at the altar. Lola turned and waved her hand to close the front door, to prevent more from entering; but all, including some Mission people, about forty in number, had already got inside.

Lola carried in her hand two vases, containing artificial white roses, and presented them to Father Fontaine, the officiating clergyman, at the altar. The ceremony, very brief, being over, the party went from the church into the ante-room, where was a spread of cake, wine, cigars and cigarettes. Wainwright gave a significant wink to Clayton, and, approaching Lola, kissed her, Clayton following the example, "just to make the occasion memorable," as he said—Lola remarking, "such is the custom of my country." No others kissed her, but all congratulated her, and she had a pleasant word for everyone.

Lola asked D. A. MacLean: "Where can we get a good breakfast?" He answered, "Plenty of places." Hull said, "A good breakfast can be procured at the Bull's Head." Lola suggested the Tivoli; she had rather go to the Tivoli, and to the Tivoli they went.

This is one of the many episodes of the checkered life of the Countess Landsfeld, the Baroness of the Order of St. Theresa. Her family name was Eliza Gilbert, born in India, of English parents, died in New York, buried in Greenwood cemetery, in Christian hope, by the Rev. S. H. Tyng, over whose remains is the monumental tablet inscribed "To the Memory of Eliza Gilbert."

The Alta's account was, however, incorrect so far as the matter of the birth and death of Montez was concerned. She was, as we have stated, born in Ireland and her death occurred on Long Island, June 30, 1861. Like The Menken, she died penniless.

King Louis I, of Bavaria, was born in 1786, and died in 1868. He ascended the throne of that kingdom October 13, 1835, a year after the birth of Montez. His governmental policy in the earlier years of his reign were characterized by the fostering of literature and the arts; he was popular and he remained so until the disturbances broke out in Munich, engendered by the supposed influence of Montez over his mind. Shortly after the flight of Montez, the King, on March 20, 1848, resigned in favor of his son.

Another name has figured here—that of Henry Shipley—the date of whose death we obtained at the Coroner's office in this city. The entry in the alphabetical index reads: "1859, November 17, Shipley, Henry, aged 28, Mass., Suicide." On looking back at the files of the papers we learn that he committed suicide in his room by taking strychnine. He retired to bed at 5 o'clock P. M., and after his condition was discovered asked that a physician be sent for to administer an antidote for the poison. Human aid, however, could not avail. He was born in Shirley, Mass.; his father was a prominent Boston politician. Shipley graduated at Amherst College in 1850; for awhile was a druggist in Kentucky, and then came to California. Here he was associated in the editorial departments of the Marysville Herald, the Grass Valley Telegraph, the Nevada Democrat, and the Sacramento State Journal. During the Frazer river excitement, he visited Victoria, Whatcom, and the Frazer river region. At the Dalles he was thrown from a spirited horse and severely injured; he was picked up for dead and laid for weeks in an insensible condition. A zinc coffin was made and carried into his room with a view of sending his remains to this State. He recovered, however, and for a time edited the Oregon Weekly Times, published at Portland, and arrived on a visit to Sacramento, September 22, 1859. He intended to go to the Sandwich Islands with a theatrical party, but the vessel sailed before he arrived, and it is presumed that that circumstance created the despondency that induced him to take his life. His remains are buried in the City Cemetery.

The Gridley Sanitary Sack of Flour.

Those who lived in this State during the war will recollect the famous Gridley sack of flour, that was the means of raising so much money for the sanitary fund for the benefit of the Union soldiers. So far as we recollect the circumstances it was that in May, 1864, Mr. Gridley, a resident of Austin, Nevada, and a merchant there, on a wager, carried a sack of flour on his back in the streets of that city. The flour was then sold and resold for the benefit of the sanitary fund, and some $6,000 was there realized. Gridley then brought the sack of flour into California, and at a meeting held in Sacramento on May 18th, at the conclusion of a picnic, the sack was repeatedly sold with the net result of $2,150. Gridley's flour was the means of contributing many thousands of dollars to the soldiers' relief fund. Other like schemes were gotten up. At a picnic held near Sacramento, a hare was shot on the grounds; it was repeatedly sold until it realized $157. On June 18, 1864, the Sacramento sanitary committee forwarded $18,000 to the East. Gridley died several years ago, and was buried at Stockton.

The Weather.

The highest and lowest Signal Service temperature during the past week was 68° and 34°, with a severe rainstorm on the 3d, accompanied by a storm of hail with thunder and lightning. The total rainfall was 2.50 inches, as against 1 inch during the same time last year. The total rainfall for this season to date is 3.30 inches as against 10.35 inches to a corresponding date last year. The highest and lowest temperature one year ago for the corresponding week as the present one, was 60° and 46°, with stormy weather prevailing.

The Inaugural Ball.

The great social event of the season—the inaugural ball—will take place on January 9th, at the Capitol building. Now, husbands, untie your purse strings and give your wives and daughters a chance. This is an occasion that will be the subject of conversation for the next four years in society circles. We cannot afford to be stingy at this time. The executive committee has wisely given ample time to prepare.

Federated Trades' Ball.

Sacramento Council Federated Trades will give its first annual ball at Armory Hall, to-night. A fine time is expected. The Committee of Arrangements consists of W. Sheridan, G. W. McKay, P. Zimmerman, W. H. Dailey, E. R. Malone, W. Becker, W. O. Shaw, W. T. Silva, C. Keller and O. Bell.

The postman's leather satchel he carries carelessly,
The good or woe he may bestow he cares in no degree;
He's letters for good lovers, he's letters filled with bills,
And circulars of soap, cigars, lace curtains, corn cures, pills.
Down in the postman's satchel, well hid from prying eyes,
And buried deep beneath the heap, a little letter lies.
Does it bring a waiting maiden love from a lover gone afar?
No; better than that. It brings her a fat, large check from her dear papa.

NOTES.

The physicians tell us that there are a hundred chances of being struck by lightning for one of having hydrophobia.

The man who "never can find time" to do anything you ask of him may generally be seen looking out of the window when there is a brass band going through the street.

One of the greatest problems of the future is thought to be the transformation of carbon energy into light upon the same principle that the glow worm and fire fly give their light.

There are many who follow shadows. In most of these cases they become so mean and poor that their shadows refuse to follow them. Such people invariably run only in the dark.

Among the legends of the early Celtic saints nothing is more common than the story of the saint being sent to borrow fire and carry it in his lap without the fire injuring his garment.

In Switzerland, it is said, they will pay higher wages to a milkmaid who can sing to the cows than to one who cannot. This is done on the principle that bad treatment of a cow injuriously affects its milk.

There are few such common-sense proverbs as "every man is the architect of his own fortune." Appius Claudius, a Roman censor, used it in a speech delivered by him 450 years before the Christian era.

It often occurs that one can accomplish the most difficult mental results in his sleep. Intricate problems have been solved in dreams. Poems have been inspired in the quiet sleep. We all have experienced the happy outcome of mental labor while asleep.

The term "blue stocking" was originally used in Venice about the year 1400, to designate literary classes by colors. In Mill's "History of Chivalry" we are told that members of the various academies were distinguished by the color of their stockings, blue being the prevailing color.

Public opinion is of some consequence in every community. To a man of even a slight degree of sensibility it makes considerable difference whether his fellow-men look upon him as a man willing to do something for the locality in which he lives, or as a greedy, grasping cormorant who cares for nobody but himself.

There are two churches on an uptown block, and the only thing they agree upon is the removal of a poor fellow who has a little grocery, where, as an adjunct to the business, a little gin and beer are dispensed. Our orthodox friends have put their antagonistic religious creeds out of the way and joined forces against the alleged agent of the devil as personated in the unfortunate beer seller. We await the coming conflict with abated breath.

George Francis Train has challenged Succi, the Italian faster, to fast 100 days. We hope the contest will go on and that it will be demonstrated that a man can live comfortably on fresh air, for air is cheap, and nobody is liable to obtain a corner in it. We would not express this sentiment were we the proprietor of a boarding house, but since the late law was passed making it a misdemeanor for a hungry man to eat without paying for it, there has developed a violent hostility to hotel-keepers.

The capabilities of electricity as a remedial agent have just received a new illustration. A man with an aggravated case of bone felon on the thumb consulted a physician and was told that several months would elapse before he could use his hand. In his dilemma he sought the advice of a physician who had done some excellent work by means of electricity. The physician operated on the diseased member with an electric battery, and the pain, which had up to that time been intense, ceased. In four days the patient was at work again. The operation was a pronounced success and a perfect cure was soon effected.

The milk of human kindness—the spirit of forgiveness—is not so plentiful as the Scripture requires. In politics the individual who thinks he has been mistreated, harbors a feeling of resentment coupled with a determination to "get even." The man who has been jilted in love affairs holds a disposition for vengeance on his more successful rival. It only requires opportunity for those disgruntled people to execute their desire to "get even." In political circles this spirit has been rife in this city for several years. If any fellow who has the ambition to serve the good people, has in the past voted with or counseled with the other side, the other side has a knife of huge proportions ready for him when it comes to the ballot. This "get even" spirit is the only case where there is a similarity between love and politics.

Win a man's friendship by telling him today that he is the smartest one in his family, and you will have to tell him to-morrow that he is the smartest man in town, and the next day that he is the smartest man in the State.

Among the new inventions seen at the Mechanics' Fair at Boston is a method of making ice by simply dropping a few crystals in water—the secret of whose composition is known only to the inventor. Not only is the ice made in a remarkably short space of time, but ice cream is also manufactured and eaten by those who stand and wait.

A wife who knows many wives says: "Some husbands, when they get home at night, tell their wives all about the business of the day, and about their bank account, and about the people they met, and about what was spoken of, and about everything else. Other husbands never tell their wives about their doings during the day, never speak of the state of their finances, and never refer to their business in their households. The wife of such a husband knows nothing of his affairs, and is apt to be upset by bad news or crushed by finding out that he is on the road to ruin. From what I have known through my acquaintance with many families for long years, I am ready to say that a husband should always tell his wife about his business and about the affairs of the day." We think that the shop and office should never be mentioned at the hearthstone. The trials and troubles of the business hours should be discarded when we enter our homes.

THEMIS feels a conscious pride, but not a vanity, in having done its share in calling public attention to the wretched botch that has been made in the compilation of the public school text-books. Some cautious snivlers, who are ever fearing that their patriotism may be doubted unless it is carried on their coat sleeve, sought to belittle the position of this paper on the subject and pretended to believe the articles written were covert attacks on the public schools. Pitiably apology for upholding an evident wrong, a palpable outrage on a State that has so liberally prepared for grand results, by the appropriation of such largesses and the outfitting of such a magnificent printing house and bindery, specially chosen in the largest foundries and houses of the East and Europe by a most intelligent expert, wherein to do the mechanical work of the publications. But the State Convention of County Superintendents that met in this city this week has emphasized what THEMIS mildly inaugurated, by most emphatically condemning by resolution the State series, and expressing it as their judgment that a thorough revision of the books by competent authorities is imperative and should be entered upon at once. It is to be regretted that the State Superintendent did not seem to take kindly to the resolution. But it is not forgotten that before his election to that office he was in the service of one of the large book houses of the coast. And on the other hand, it is comforting to know that the State Superintendent-elect, who attended the Convention, was a hearty advocate of the measure. But he was never employed by a publishing house. Of course the gentlemen who composed this body occupied such independent positions that they were free to express their honest opinion without fear of endangering their occupations. Not so with the teachers. There are scores of the latter throughout the State who know the facts about the books as well as do the Superintendents but, as in all employments in this liberty-loving country of ours where freedom of speech is tolerated, with them in this instance silence is golden. They may now rejoice.

Inhabitants of Two Worlds.

While the man and woman are reared in two worlds as they are to-day, there can be no universal joy in marriage, as every child born is more or less a hybrid. I say "to-day" with special emphasis, for the separation has never more distinct or more disastrous than now. As long as the main feelings of the race are identical, while they are united on the principles of life, minor differences of sex-education can be gotten over! There is an essential similarity, and a chance of joy and gain proportionate to that similarity.

For instance, in our Puritan ancestors the religious sentiment was the main thread of life. They lived and died for their religion; the real man and woman were one in education, action and belief, and marriage worked well with them.

Still further back, in days of war, though man lived on the battlefield and woman in the home, still their hopes, fears and ambitions were alike; they had the same conscience, the same essential character; they were one in the main sentiment of life, and marriage worked well with them.

But to-day the whole internal lives of man and woman are opposed. They work from different motives, by different means, toward different purposes. Happy marriages are found mainly among two classes: either where the woman is of the earlier type—self-immolate, domestic, wholly absorbed in her love and her "lot;" or in those rarer cases where the woman is individualized and does special work in the same line with her husband.

But in the mass we find a world of discord, active or passive. Man is now a "business" animal. The majority of his actions, his thoughts, feelings, hopes, and fears, take place in a world woman knows nothing about. He is part of a huge complex coöperative structure; she is a separate atom, unattached save to her own family. He is a part of what he has made—the life of the present. She is not even a part, but a detached specimen of the life of the past. Mentally, morally, and physically, they are brought up in two worlds. They never meet save on one ground; and their union on that ground is a theme for Juvenal and Jeremiah. A man is a tolerably well-balanced animal, who enjoys physical exertion and physical rest. A woman is an unbalanced, nervous animal, who does not know what it is to enjoy anything physical except dancing and a rocking chair. Her exertion is exhaustion, her rest is excitement.

A man is a tolerably well-balanced mentality, who knows the rudiments of logic, and whose personal life is more or less consistent and reasonable. A woman is a radically unbalanced mentality, whose daily existence is a denial of logic and reason, whose beliefs and habits are hopelessly inconsistent and unreasonable.

And morally? It is more than another world, it is another universe!

What virtues they even call by the same names are so different in scale as to be unrecognizable; and for the most part they have different names for the same thing, or different things for the same name.

For instance, look at "honor" male and female, "virtue" male and female, and the like. There is hardly an act in the lives of either that would come under the same standard; and the judgment of either on the acts of the other is mere mockery. As well ask the opinion of a cow on the moral value of a pelican.

And yet these two beings are expected to live together as equals, to understand, to sympathize, to love.—Kate Field's Washington.

A correspondent of London Truth relates that meeting an American gentleman he had occasion to ask him which point was the north. The gentleman said he could soon tell him, and pulling out his watch he did so. He then explained that all watches are compasses, and described the way in which they could be used as such. The hour hand is pointed to the sun and the south will be exactly half way between the hour and the figure XII on the watch. Supposing, for instance, it is 4 o'clock, the hand indicating IV will be pointed to the sun and II on the watch will be exactly south. If it is 8 o'clock, the hand indicating VIII will be pointed to the sun and the figure X on the watch will be due south. The correspondent further states that, meeting Mr. Stanley shortly afterwards, he asked the eminent traveler whether he was aware of this simple mode of discovering the points of the compass. He said he had never heard of it, but he had a good word to say of the American who was thus the means of making generally known this ingenious method of "taking the bearings."

"Fledgely must be quite well off with the world's goods." "I've never had that impression. Why do you think so?" "He showed me a handful of diamonds last evening." "Do you mean it?" "Yes, I do, and he won the pot with them."

Mme. Barrios, widow of the late Central American dictator, has a magnificent collection of diamonds. The greater part of the jewels were heirlooms of the Kingdom of Guatemala.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY OF Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of E. M. STEVENS, an Insolvent Debtor. — E. M. Stevens, having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in Insolvency, from which it appears that he is an Insolvent Debtor, the said E. M. Stevens is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said E. M. Stevens, insolvent debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from a execution; and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers; and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an Assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to such insolvent to him or to any person, firm, corporation or association for his use; and the said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered, that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Hon. J. W. Armstrong, Judge of the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the Court-room of said Court, in the County of Sacramento, on the 26th day of December, 1890, at 1:30 o'clock P. M. of that day, to prove their debts and choose one or more Assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered, that the order be published in the Themis, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the day set for the meeting of creditors. And it is further ordered, that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.
W. C. VAN FLEET,
Judge of the Superior Court.
Dated November 19th, 1890.

The Village Shoemaker.

The village shoemaker was a jolly old soul, wasn't he? Did you ever meet him? No? Well, that's really too bad. I see him now—leathered, waxy, There beside the big, old fashioned window he sits and pegs, and stitches, and pounds, from early morn till evening shadows fall, and generally far into the night. He's an industrious fellow, this village shoemaker. He is light-hearted, but his task is not light, by any means. And how he does talk, to be sure. Even with a mouth full of pegs and a wax-end in it he chatters away. Of course, he knows all the people in the village, even up to the brand new baby. And how he does love the children, and how the children do love him. His leather-littered little shop on the sunny corner is a regular nursery. You can punch holes in the bench with his awl, stick his wax on the windows, play with his bristles, pound with his hammer, cut with his awfully sharp knife, and he won't scold, will he? His temper is as pliable as his leather. His heart is as tenacious as his wax. His wit is as keen as his knife. His eyes are as penetrating as his awl. And how he can whistle and sing while hammering a sole—no wail of a lost soul there. No matter if he does smell of leather and looks as tough as his oak tanned hide, all is forgotten in the sunshine of his smile and the shower of his light talk. And how the boys seek his little work room. He knows where the squirrels are thickest, the nuts largest, the cherries ripest, the berries freshest, the fish gamest. He is the children's pleasure-guiding genius. There he chats and cuts, whistles and waxes, talks and pounds, laughs and pegs, sings and sews. He works while we wear, he sews while we rip, he mends while we tear. He's at the christening and the reunion, the wedding and the weeping, the waking and the sleeping. I see him now as in the long ago—leathery, waxy, jolly—a man who feared God and loved his fellows—hammering, pegging, pulling, cutting—shoving the clouds away from a little vine-covered cottage full of sunshine, love and laughter.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

Cleopatra was a pure Greek. The great probability is that she was very like a modern Parisienne, with an eager, mobile face, not beautiful at all in the sculptor's sense, but with a certain magnetic attractiveness intensely felt by Roman nobles like Caesar and Antony, accustomed to the heavier and more apathetic beauty of their own caste.

Husband—For heaven's sake, what is the matter?
Wife (groping desperately under the bed)—I have lost my collar button.

Citizen—So you think of locating here?
Physician—Yes. I thought some of practicing among you.

Citizen—See here, young man, there's a good opening here for a man as understands his biz, but we don't want no practicing, or experimenting—doctoring's what we want!

Many times women call on their family physicians, suffering, as they imagine, one from dyspepsia, another from heart disease, another from liver or kidney disease, another from nervous exhaustion or prostration, another with pain here or there, and in this way they all present, alike to themselves and their easy-going and indifferent or overbusy doctor, separate and distinct diseases, for which he prescribes his pills and potions, assuming them to be such, when, in reality, they are all only symptoms caused by some womb disorder. The physician, ignorant of the cause of suffering, encourages his "practice" until large bills are made. The suffering patient gets no better, but probably worse by reason of the delay, wrong treatment and consequent complications. A proper medicine, like Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription directed to the cause would have entirely removed the disease, thereby dispelling all those distressing symptoms, and instituting comfort instead of prolonged misery.

It's the only medicine for the weaknesses, irregularities and painful derangements peculiar to women, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee that it will give satisfaction in every case, or price ($1.00) paid for it will be promptly refunded.

FLASHES.

Some people rather hug delusions than pretty girls. We don't.

There is something radically wrong about the man who never gets mad.

A woman forgets when she forgives, a man only forgives when he forgets.

Does the devil make men so bad, or is it the men who make the devil so bad?

Ever doubtless charmed Adam, but if she had been a snake charmer how different the world would be.

It is easier to manage a switch than a train. This is a fashion note or a railway item, just as you please.

The Indian prediction that a mud wave will engulf the palefaces is laughed to scorn by our street cleaners.

To Chinamen is attributed the saying that all the sustenance the human system requires is rice, vinegar and oil.

Whenever the church people put a movement on foot for doing good the devil puts one on horseback to get ahead of it.

The devil has no regular office hours, but you can depend on finding him in and ready for business whenever you call upon him.

A Scranton woman who wants a divorce claims that her husband used to rub limburger cheese on her. The strength of some men's affections is simply incalculable.

Nothing in the world comes so near being perfectly and absolutely fire-proof as the kindling wood that the husband uses to build the kitchen fire with on a cold morning.

The expression, "He is a brick," is over 2,000 years old. Agesilaus, king of Sparta, 880 B. C., in showing his army of 10,000 men, pointing to them, said, "There are the walls of Sparta, and every man is a brick."

I had a peep in paradise last night,
And there I saw, all clad in gorgeous yellows,
The only remnant of our choir bright,
The lad—the little one—who worked the bellows.

He said my eyes were diamonds bright, my cheeks like jacqueminots, my neck and brow as fair and white as winter's purest snows. He swore my hair was like the gold that tints the sunset skies, my chin was cast in Cupid's mold—and truth seemed in his eyes. My smile was like the new born day, my teeth twin rows of pearl, and after that he went away to see another girl.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

Clara Morris and her splendid company will commence an engagement at the Metropolitan on Wednesday night, December 10, and continue for three nights.

Miss Laura Borden, with the Swedish Quartet, gave a concert under the management of the Lecture Association on Thursday night at the Congregational Church. There was a large attendance.

Last night Herrmann's Transatlantiques gave one of their splendid exhibitions. The company is much stronger than when here before. To-night, Herrmann's Transatlantiques again. For an evening's enjoyment this is the place.

On Monday and Tuesday evenings the McNeill Club will present Wallace's famed four-act opera, Maritana. The McNeill Club is noted for its talent, and never leaves anything undone to make its entertainments successful. The opera is romantic, being a musical version of Don Cesar de Bazan, and embraces some of the famous lyric gems so popular to the music-loving people of the world. Alfred Wilkie will assume the role of "Don Cesar," and Mrs. A. E. Bruue that of "Maritana." The remaining characters will be rendered by Miss Lulu Thurston, Miss Milly Brandt, Horace Crocker, W. H. Kinross, Harry Love, C. M. Phinney and Albert Hart. W. H. Kinross will assume his favorite character of "Don Jose." There will be an increased orchestra, and a well-drilled chorus.

Fish Charms.

Travelers who have penetrated into the easternmost parts of Southern Russia find some strange beliefs as to the power of fish charms. Many fish found in those countries have two small, hard, round bones on the side of the head. They are believed to have the power, when worn by the owner, to prevent colic, and they are termed colic stones. The more wealthy of the peasants have colic stones mounted in gold, and they are worn upon the neck as a valuable addition to the necklace. The bones of the common bull-head are much used among the Russian peasants as a charm against fever. Among European nations in the middle-ages, doctors of medicine had faith that two bones found in the head of the tench have medicinal virtues. The bones were applied to the skin in cases of fever. The tench is a European fish, and the United States Fish Commission is endeavoring to introduce it to American waters.

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
A. J. JOHNSTON, Managing Editor.

The subject of the cause of crime has engaged the attention, investigation and thought of the wise and the unwise for ages, and will in times to come. The theories in relation to the causes of crime have been and will be as various and different as the minds of men. Some have ascribed the cause to the moral depravity, by nature, of all men; but we cannot assent to the proposition that all men are depraved. This would be carrying the doctrine of original sin a little too far. We prefer to think with the poet, Burns, when he says:

"I'll no say men are villians a';
The real harden'd wicked,
Who hae nae chick but human law,
Are to a few restricted."

But other theorists impute the cause of crime to the depravity of degenerate races or families. And if they would only add to this, idleness and evil associations, which lead to drunkenness and dissipation, upon the principle that "an idle brain is the devil's work-house," and evil communications corrupt good manners, they would find believers in us. It is conceded at this day that the brain is the seat of the mind; and as the organism of the brain of one man differs from that of another, the cranial functions of the one differs from the other, and it must be a truism that to the extent they differ in their cranial functions, they differ in their mental and intellectual powers, and consequently they differ in their tendency to vice, immorality and crime. The science of phrenology, a science as well established as any other, teaches these truths, and when one hemisphere of the brain of a man is abnormally developed his tendency to vice, immorality and crime is greater than such tendency in men, both of the hemispheres of whose brain are of normal development. It may be observed that where one hemisphere of the brain is abnormally developed to the disparagement of the other, it is frequently, if not universally, indicated by the physiognomy, countenance or configuration of the face. Such persons do not act with equanimity; they cannot look impartially upon both sides of any question where their interest, as they see it, lies on one side only; the temptation to take the view of circumstances to the exclusion of morality, which will subserve their interest and desires, is with them sometimes irresistible, unless their natural inclination has been subdued by moral training, which has settled into a habit of self-denial. How that training should be accomplished probably no two would agree. Some theorists have said that the panacea to cure this tendency to vice, immorality and crime is to be found in universal education—such as is furnished in our common schools, colleges and universities. But is this so? Does secular education do more than develop the intellectual powers of the mind? The intellectual powers of the mind may receive a high degree of cultivation, while the moral sense lies entirely dormant. It may be safely stated that a large proportion of the criminals in the civilized world belong to the educated class; if, then, secular education trained the moral and subdued the immoral sense or tendency to vice and crime, why are there so many educated criminals? The proportion of the educated, it is believed, greatly exceeds the illiterate. Why is this so? But we leave this question for others to answer. It is certain, however, that with the increase of education crime has increased. Wherefore, some theorists infer that education—secular education—is the cause of crime; but we wholly dissent from this conclusion. If they were to say that the habits of idleness contracted, and evil associations, while attending the common or other schools, were the cause of crime, there might be some force in the argument. But education, as obtained in our common schools, colleges and universities, is neither the cause nor a preventative of crime. Our conclusion is that the natural vicious tendency of the class from which our criminals come, aided by idleness and evil associations, in the absence of moral training or education, lead to drunkenness, licentiousness, dissipation, immorality and vice; and these lead immediately and directly to crime. And, independent of a vicious inclination, idleness and evil associations, by no means are the least factor in the general cause of crime. This conclusion is justified by many considerations, some of which we will consider: First—The female population far exceeds the male. The statistics of crime show that the relative proportion of female criminals to the male is about three per cent. of the whole. Why is this so? There must be some reason for this wonderful fact. What is it? Can it be attributed to the natural organism of the brain? Is it to be proclaimed that boys are organized for crime and girls are not? No. Women are as capable of both vice and crime as men. History, both ancient and modern, furnish many examples of women descending to the lowest depths of vice and immorality and committing the most atrocious crimes; and it has been frequently said that when a woman falls from virtue and uprightness into vice and crime, she descends lower than men; but whether this is so, it is immaterial now to inquire. It is certain, however, that there is by nature the same depravity in woman that there is in man. In their development, if unchecked, the same vicious tendencies are found in women that there are in men, and they lead to the same results. There is, naturally, no difference in this respect between the sexes. The one is as capable of vice and crime as the other; therefore, the reason why one of the sexes runs to vice and crime and the other does not, must be within the control of society. What is it? It is in our social habits and conventional proprieties. By these, girls are not permitted to do what boys do with impunity; the girl is kept at home with some useful thing to do, under parental influences, and beyond the reach of the allurements and temptations to vice, immorality and crime to which boys are subjected, for our boys are permitted to roam in idleness in the streets and alleys of the cities, with evil associates, and without restraint to visit resorts of pleasure, amusements, lewdness and licentiousness, and there play cards, gamble, drink and dissipate until midnight or later; and besides they are permitted to commit other immoral acts, without moving the placid nerves of society. But suppose a girl should do likewise. Why, our social conventionalisms would condemn her. Mrs. Grundy and all the folks would be scandalized, and society would be paralyzed with wonderment at her depravity. It is, then, our social morality which protects, restrains and keeps girls from vicious temptations, while it leaves the boys victims, in their idleness, to vicious temptations and the seductive influences of evil associates. This is the solution of the question involved in the strange fact that the male criminals exceeds the female by about ninety-seven per cent. Secondly—The large towns and cities furnish by far, a greater proportion of criminals than the rural populations. The rural districts furnish but few criminals in proportion to the number of criminals from the whole population. What is the reason? It is apparent. In the rural districts the boys are kept at work; they always have something to do; they are within the moral influence of home; and they live apart from the idle, the dissolute, and the vicious. Crime usually commences with the idler, in dissipation and vicious indulgences. In the large towns and cities the opportunity for such dissipation and indulgence is found; not so in the country, or if so, only to a modified extent. A boy before he is subjected to temptation is as innocent as a girl. Before he is prepared to become a criminal he must be seduced, allured and inducted into the ways of vice, immorality and dissipation; this done, and he is educated into crime. In the large towns and cities there is a large army of idle, dissolute, dissipated and vicious boys and young men who infest every street, every corner, and every alley, ready to beset all other boys and young men with their importunities, and who invite and urge them to drinking, to dissipation, and to licentious indulgences; and by their social and seductive manners they lead their victims astray; and thus, many a boy, and many a young man has fallen into vice and crime who otherwise would have been an ornament to society. He was the victim of evil influences and untoward circumstances which his natural moral sense was too weak to withstand. Then the circumstances and conditions surrounding a boy frequently decide his destiny for life; whether he shall be an ornament or a curse to society, or an honor or a disgrace to his parents and friends. Many young men and boys who have lived honest, upright and virtuous lives in their country homes, upon being transferred from the country to a great town or city, find themselves amid temptations and allurements peculiar to great towns and cities, and not having received sufficient moral training or education, nor having by nature sufficient moral force of character to resist, soon plunge into the vortex of licentiousness, dissipation, vice and crime; but if they had remained in the country, out of reach of such temptations and allurements, they would have been useful men in society. As it was they were the victims of vicious associations. Thirdly—There is another fact to be observed in considering the question under discussion. The great proportion of criminals comes from two classes of the population. The abject poor and the rich. The middle class does not furnish so many in proportion to the whole as either the rich or abject poor. It needs only little experience in the administration of justice to be satisfied of this fact. Abject poverty is the abode of hunger and want. Hunger and want often tempts to stealing and stealing leads to the commission of other and higher crimes. Besides, poor parents who live in the city are compelled to earn by daily labor their daily bread. They have no employment for their children nor time to watch over them, and the boys find their way into the streets and consort with the criminal element of society. Those already educated in crime teach the others until they pass from one grade of instruction in criminal practice to another and so on, till they graduate in the State Prison or are executed on the gallows. Those poor parents by reason of their poverty, having no time to look after their boys, are to some extent compelled to surrender them as victims to vice. But not so with the rich parents. They are responsible for the criminal lives of their sons. It too often occurs that parents who by industry and rigid economy have grown rich, consider labor a disgrace, to which their children must not be subjected. They could find labor for them if they would and preserve them from vice and crime; but, no; the sons must be bred gentlemen, and in their narrow, contracted views, idleness, dress and extravagance are the tests of a gentleman. The son is idle; he dresses well; he is extravagant; he dissipates; he freely indulges his vicious passions; his parents die; he receives his patrimony; he squanders it; he is reduced to want; he plunges into crime; he goes to the State Prison or the gallows; and this is the end of him. Abundance of wealth furnishes means of vicious indulgences, and through vice, leads to want and crime. The rich, while rich, can afford to be vicious; but the abject poor cannot afford to be honest and virtuous as they might die of starvation. The great body of our industrious population forms the middle class, who by their industry, attention to business and thrift, are enabled to watch over the moral as well as intellectual education and training of their children and by these means preserve themselves and children from the temptations of licentiousness, dissipation and vice and consequently from crime, while want of occupation enforces idleness, frequently, upon the abject poor and their children and leaves them with an evil inclination an easy proselyte to vicious and criminal morality; and as wealth enables its possessor to be idle, the son of the wealthy in his idleness seeks pleasure, recreation, and amusement in the society of the lewd, the dissolute, the dissipated and vicious and soon becomes a convert to their mode of life and falls under the deadly blight of their influence. This thought is so well expressed and illustrated by Alexander Pope, whose poems so abound in wisdom, that we cannot do better than quote his language:

"Vice is a monster of so frightful mien,
As to be hated, needs but to be seen;
Yet seen too oft, familiar with her face,
We first condone, then pity, then embrace."

From what has been said, the conclusion is, that besides, independent of a vicious inclination, the chief causes of vice, immorality, and crime are idleness and evil associations. Remove idleness and evil association and replace them with good moral influences and active industry, the mind being occupied, the chief cause of crime will be removed from society.

One of the most important measures for the consideration and action of the incoming Legislature is the apportionment of members of the Senate and Assembly in accordance with the recent census. Sacramento, under anything like a fair apportionment, will be entitled to two Senators. It is already conceded by the leading men of all parties that such an allowance is just, and will probably be accorded. As to the proper basis for the redistricting of this county, various suggestions have been made. As for the three Assembly Districts, there could scarcely be a more equitable arrangement than what now exists. Each of these districts are about as nearly equal as could be obtained, thus no change is necessary in that direction. The division with Senatorial Districts is attended with more difficulty, and care must be taken in creating these districts. An equitable plan suggests itself, that is to say, let the city and county be divided so as to have part of the county outside of the city in each district. It would hardly be fair to give the county outside of the city a Senator as a district, but have the boundaries so adjusted that it may remain a matter of judgment whether a Senator should be accorded the country. There must be no opportunity for any clash between the people of the city and the county.

The ancients' idea of beauty in woman, taken from the preserved works of art, discloses a very wide difference from our notions of attractiveness in our fair sisters. We find them praising women who had red hair and narrow foreheads. Heavy eyebrows that almost formed an arch above their noses were distinguishing marks of beauty. Goldsmith, in one of his cynical moods, drew the lines of beauty as designated by some of the nations of the world. An African lover demanded thick lips, a Chinese thinks there is only beauty in thin. Greeks and Circassians admire only straight noses. The Tartars, who are only separated from China by mountains, can see nothing to admire in women unless they have flat noses and crescent moon eyes. Black eyes and olive hue only attract the Spanish and South American lover. In our country there are rarely two men who agree upon what particular features in women constitute beauty. The girl who appears beautiful to one, possesses no attraction for another. With us it is simply a question of taste. Some like blue eyes—others black. Blondes are the ideals of some, while there is divinity only in brunettes for others.

PART I.

Some years ago there was acquired by the State a manuscript diary of the late Col. P. L. Edwards, that contained a narration of the events that transpired on an overland trip he made to this coast in 1837. Judge John W. Armstrong, General Jo Hamilton and the late James C. Goods were instrumental in securing this valuable acquisition to the State Library. They were at that time members of the State Library Board. The manuscript, from time has become faded and dim; that it will be preserved, by resolution of the Trustees of the State Library, it has been placed in our hands for publication.

Colonel Edwards was a prominent lawyer and a scholarly gentleman, and his observations of this then almost unknown country we esteem of incalculable value. After his return he published a pamphlet descriptive of California; it was prophetic of the future, we of to-day are witnesses of the realization of what he pictured.

Colonel Edwards was a native of Kentucky, born in 1812, and after his early visit to California returned to the East. He was then admitted to the bar, elected to the Missouri Legislature in 1843, chosen a delegate to the Whig National Convention in 1844, located in Sacramento in 1850, ran unsuccessfully upon the Whig ticket for Congress in 1852, and was a prominent candidate for United States Senator in 1855. He was a leading member of the bar of this city, and died here May 1, 1869.

We have known of the existence of this volume for several years, and present its contents through the courtesy of the Board of Library Trustees, which we deeply appreciate. The resolution of the Board is as follows:

WHEREAS, The MSS. presented to this Library by P. L. Edwards, Esq., giving an account of an expedition in California in 1837, is a valuable acquisition to the State Library; and whereas, The attention of this Board has been directed to the fact that the ink is fast fading, destroying the usefulness and value of the work; therefore, be it

Resolved, That Librarian Perkins be, and he is hereby authorized to negotiate with some newspaper publisher and have the same printed, and to have the files of said newspaper bound for this Library.

The diary of Colonel Edwards is as follows:

Friday, 14 January, 1837. At night the formation of the Wallamette Cattle Company was completed at campment Des Sable.

Monday, 17 Jan'y. Took leave of the Mission, and at 3 o'clock P. M. left campment Des Sable, in company with Messrs. Young, Hauveherst, Carmichael, Bailey, Esquette and Des Pan. Camped nearly opposite the mouth of Pudding river. Rained nearly all night, and having no tent slept uncomfortably.

Tuesday, 18 Jan'y. Set off at sunrise, and with much difficulty got our canoe past the Wallamette Falls about 1 o'clock P. M. About 2 o'clock finished our breakfast, and renewed our journey. About sunset camped at an old house formerly occupied by Mr. Lucia. Nearly the whole day a cold rain was falling. My feet were all day in water, and having to work, I of course could not keep myself wrapped up. Even my shirt was drenched and I was so benumbed that it was with difficulty I could exert myself in getting the baggage ashore.

Wednesday, 19th. At sunset reached the brig Loriot, anchored about a mile and a half below Wappoto island. Camped on shore. After dark Mr. Slocum arrived from Fort Vancouver.

Thurs., 20th. Our party remained on shore. Capt. Bancroft and Mr. Lee arrived from Fort Vancouver, about 8 o'clock at night.

Friday, 21st. Put our outfit on board and all embarked.

Saturday, 22d. At 9 o'clock A. M. the party and crew being called to the quarter deck, Mr. Lee prayed for the Divine blessing to attend us all; after which the anchor was weighed and we began to drop down the Columbia. Anchored at night off Oak Point.

Sunday, 23. About 10 o'clock A. M. ran aground above Sand Island. In about two hours, with the favor of the tide, again got under way. At night anchored in Gray's Bay, near Tongue Point.

Monday, 24. Fine breeze. Passed Fort George about 10 o'clock A. M. Hardly had I caught a distant and shadowy view of Neptune's restless domains, when the mischievous and frolicsome old monarch, began to exhibit his ruling passion by gently wrestling from the poor, hapless land lubbers' stomach its contents, and infusing his sickening influence through his whole system. And forsooth little is the sympathy which the sufferer excites. Twice I vomited and twice the riseables of those around were excited. Mr. Birnie, from Fort George, came off in a canoe and joined us. With a fine breeze swept down to Baker's bay, and anchored in the Horse shoe near Cape Disappointment, at one o'clock P. M. Capt. Brothie and McNeal had been here for near a month, the latter twenty-eight days. Went ashore with Capt. Brothie and ascended the Cape. Those fervid emotions which I had anticipated would attend my first gaze over the vasty deep did not arise. Seasickness is an infallible remedy to poetic fancies. As I stood on the bold promontory and gazed over the mightiest ocean of earth; the broad and majestic river was behind me; on my right and left the frightful breakers, bursting and thundering. Had the vagaries of fancy, too sanguine expectations, divested the scene of interest, or did indisposition repress, in a good degree, pleasurable emotions?

Tuesday, 25. Went with Mr. Slocum to the Indian village at the mouth of Chinook river. Missing the proper channel we were in some danger in crossing the bar.

Friday, 28. At night the wind blew a storm which threatened our safety. With a second anchor we held our place.

Sat., 29, and Sun., 30. At sunrise the wind abated. At night it again blew a storm from the S. E. At 2 o'clock in the morning our cable parted. A second anchor was immediately thrown out. A signal gun was fired, but not heard on account of the roar of winds and seas. The flash of the powder, however, being seen by Capt. McNeal and Brothie, they ventured off to us with much danger, but said they could render us no assistance. About sunrise our second and last cable parted. The kedge was immediately slipped, and we drove before the wind. It was thought we could not drive ashore anywhere besides in shoal water, and therefore had little prospect of continuing our voyage. Fortunately we gained a favorable spot. Two ropes were employed to keep the vessel from driving further aground—one to a stump in the water, and the other to a tree on shore. Here the vessel lay beating the sand until the recession of the tide, when she became quiet. We now observed that we had narrowly escaped striking upon snags and stumps of trees, which were covered by the water when the tide was up. Our party encamped on shore. An anchor and kedge were borrowed from the other vessels in the bay. About 3 o'clock, with the return of the tide and a heavy gale of wind, we worked out into the open bay. While the old brig was laboring and tugging, and as I fancied, seriously threatening to try it on her beam-ends, Capt. Brothie's boat was swamped (himself and part of his crew were assisting us). She was, however, rescued before the tackle by which she was fastened to the ship broke. Meantime the plug in the Loriot's boat came out, and she was near filling. The wind not allowing us to get into a more secure place, we were forced to anchor as soon as we had gained five fathoms water. The tide falling, we again saw that we had narrowly missed snags and snags; for they were scattered plentifully between us and shore. Our situation to-night is anything but enviable. If our cable fail again, with the wind from the same direction, we must certainly be driven aground far from shore, perhaps a half a mile or a mile, and heavy surf is breaking all along the beach.

Monday, 31. Capt. Bancroft set off for Vancouver to procure anchors. In the afternoon accompanied Mr. Slocum to Chinook village. The tide being low, we were forced to pull the boat with our hands about a hundred yards over the bar, where we had formerly been endangered by the breakers. In going out, however, we took the channel, and avoided wading and pulling.

Friday, 4 February. Beat down to the lower part of the bay, and anchored in a more secure place. Slept ashore.

Wednesday, 8. On account of our detention we were apprehensive that our stock of provisions would not be sufficient. The bateau in which Capt. Bancroft had arrived the day before returning to Fort George to procure one of the anchors she had left there, it was thought advisable that I should go in her. Supposing that their stock of rum was not adequate to their demand, one of the boatmen prudently exchanged his blanket with an Indian for a bottle full. This prudential bargain was, no doubt, made to secure the continuance of their happiness, for they were already as happy as ever drunkenness could well make them. Under this favorable omen we set out. As we passed one of the vessels (the Nexside) the supercargo, not being advised of our supply, kindly treated our crew to a glass each. Before we had reached the swells off Chinook bar, the singing of the boatmen had ceased, and they began to exhibit their combative propensities by dropping their oars, pulling off their clothes, swearing most bravely, striking their clenched fists together, and occasionally falling backwards off their seats. While we were tossing on the swells, one more heroic than the rest, threw his oar overboard as preparatory to a pugilistic encounter. It was, however, recovered by the sternsman, who was less intoxicated than the rest. Fortunately, their spirits had a little evaporated before we reached Chinook Point. The passage here is between the spit outside and the breakers on the beach. In the passage itself there were heavy swells and occasional breakers. A little imprudence here might probably have saved me the trouble of writing my escape. The breakers several times broke over the bow, in which I was seated, but without any other injury than wetting my clothes. When we reached Chinook village the wind was deemed too high to venture across. The boat was, therefore, drawn up on the beach. I was invited by one of the principal men of the village to go into his house. He spread a neat mat for me to sit on, asked me if I was hungry, and beating up some dried sturgeon between two stones set it before me. What means all this, thought I. I have not been accustomed to such hospitality from the Indian. Verily, mused I, this presents a redeeming feature in the Indian character! or, perchance, this household is more than mediocre, a rare instance of kindly sentiment amid a mercenary and sinister race. Here, a few shadowy dreams of the patriarchs intervened. Perhaps, I continued, these poor creatures are not really defective in—halo tum shixt, here interrupted my agreeable musing. "No rum, friend?" I replied, "none." They pointed to the boatmen who were drinking. I said they were not my people. But neither abuse of rum nor the declaration that I had none could give satisfaction. In about an hour and a half, the wind having partially abated, we prepared to cross the river. One old man who had been very officious in assisting to draw the boat upon the beach on our arrival, had sued to satiety for rum, and had fallen asleep from disappointment and vexation. Another angrily refused my hand at parting, saying I "was not good." The one who had invited me to the house continued friendly to the last. Perhaps it would do injustice to attribute all his kindness to motives as humble as those certainly were which influenced the kindness of the majority. Two of our boatmen were too much intoxicated to proceed in the boat, and were left lying senseless as brute could wish in the Indian house. There were now three men in the boat and myself. Proceeding a half mile from shore we raised a sail, and though there was considerable sea, reached the south of the river without much difficulty, just below Fort George Point. About sunset reached Fort George, thankful to have escaped the dangers with which I had been menaced.

Thursday, 9. Set out at half past 11 A. M., with Mr. Birnie in his canoe, and after a pleasant passage, reached the ship about 4 P. M. The bateau took in the men who had been left the day before.

Friday, 10. At sunrise Capts. McNeal and Brotchie having ascended the cape to ascertain the practicability of going out, pronounced the bar favorable. The three vessels immediately weighed anchor and sailed, the Lorient bringing up the rear. Wind and tide being favorable, we were soon floating on the blue, vasty deep, the bar being almost as smooth as the ocean outside which, indeed, was not the smoothest. Winds and seas increased, and consequently seasickness.

Saturday, 11. At 8 o'clock this morning the brig Laura, which left us yesterday appeared in the dim distance and swept down upon us with that grandeur which I had imagined a fine vessel under full sail would show, but which I had never before witnessed. At 10 o'clock she came up with us, and after exchanging salutations bore on her magnificent flight, now sinking, and anon mounting the combing billows, until she seemed to mingle in the dim shadows of the horizon. And, is there, thought I, no fairy land beyond? How much is there to palliate the enthusiasm of voyagers before geographical knowledge had attained its present extent! During the night the sea was boisterous, the pumps frequently in action, a sound to which my ears were very averse.

Sunday, 12. This morning was in sight of Fort Ross, the Russian establishment. At 8 o'clock fired a gun, which was answered by one from the Fort. About 10 o'clock Mr. Slocum set off in the boat for the fort. About an hour after two men in a skin canoe came to us. One of them was our pilot. Two others which were coming off were turned back by Mr. Slocum. About sunset the wind, which had been calm during the day, began to blow a strong breeze from S. E., and continued until nearly day, when it shifted to N. W. How sick; how melancholy! Notwithstanding ing the rain I could stay no where but on deck, unless I was sleeping. The wind was too strong for us to lie to; consequently, we were driven out to sea, when the wind veered to N. W. We were able, however, to change our course.

Monday, Feb'y. 20. A pleasant morning. Land in sight, though there was fog. With a favorable breeze entered Port Bodego at 9 o'clock. Once more I am on my own element. What a repulsive passage. Tempestuous and cold! sick and melancholy! Perhaps no period of my life has been less calculated to give happiness. But peace! God is merciful and I am safe! The climate here is delightful. The ground is green and the hills and mountains clad in verdure to their summits.

Tuesday, 21st. Mr. Slocum and Don Pedro, the commandante of the Russian establishment, came aboard.

Wednesday, 22. Our party and outfit disembarked. 27th. Most of our party and baggage went to Capt. Cooper's mill.

28th. Early this morning Mr. Young and myself embarked in the Lorient for Port San Francisco. The wind being low at night we were off Pointe De Reyes. At night the wind springing up and the captain being unacquainted with the coast, the vessel lay off and on during the night. The weather pleasant and myself not so sick as usual.

Tuesday, 29 Feb'y. This morning found ourselves drifting between the Farallone Islands and Sir Francis Drake's Bay, having made little advance during the night. During the day but little wind. At 4 P. M. it became so feeble that we found ourselves drifting with the tide towards shore in Drake's Bay. There was a short distance below us a reef of rocks which extended as far up as we were. An anchor was thrown out in 13 fathoms water and after letting out 80 fathoms of chain, our bow was in 9 and our stern in 7 fathoms water. In this unenviable situation night set in with a heavy wind from S. S. E. and rain. Tremendous seas were breaking over our bows, and it was pretty evident even to the inexperienced land lubber that we would not weather it until morning. The violent motions of the vessel had induced so violent a headache that I was fain to retreat from this scene of terror to the cabin. Spreading my pallet on the cabin floor, I fell in a slumber. At 9 o'clock I was aroused by a frightful crashing on deck, and the cry that the cable had parted. All were immediately on deck to assist in throwing out the second anchor, when, to our great satisfaction, we ascertained that only the windlass had capsized. The Captain now calling his officers to the quarter deck declared the ship in danger. Should the larger cable fail, there was, he said, not hope that the smaller would hold. That therefore the only hope of saving the people was in running the vessel aground in a small bay to the northward, which might possibly be effected, if the reef to the N. W. which was discernable by the breakers on it did not prevent, and that we were now probably on the continuation of the reef. With the same wind there was, he said, no hope of retaining our hold, for the seas would continue to increase. Unless the wind shifted we must therefore be ready for the worst, and the harsh grating of the chain as a furious sea dashed over the ship's bow and washed her decks, as if frantic to impel us towards the frightful reef, augured his apprehensions too rational. But that kind Providence who had "clothed and fed us all our lives long" did not forsake us. Before 10 o'clock the wind had changed to the N. W., and at 10 we began to draw up our anchor, which, the windlass being useless, we were forced to do with tackles. It is peculiarly trying to labor unsuccessfully when life, perhaps, depends upon its issue. It was, however, our fate. The old tackles parted three or four times, and consequently we must lose chain before it could be arrested. In three hours, however, of tugging at the tackles, the anchor was got up and sails unfurled. It required the entire force on board, and my blistered hands could attest my own exertions. The decks were so slippery from the rain that they were necessarily sprinkled with sand, and even then many were our slips and a few falls. Hardly had we got under way, when the stupid Sandwich Islander at the helm, either through inattention or fright, brought the vessel about. She was, however, soon brought right again, and in a few minutes we were considered safe. The sternsman, who was so near putting us in new troubles, was punished on the spot. But the propriety of whipping a man under such circumstances I think more than questionable. First, let danger blow past and passion abate. A man smarting and indignant from castigation will be less disposed to do his duty as well as less collected. We now sailed on the east of the Farallone Islands. There are two of them, small and barren, with sunken rocks between.

Senator Evarts said to a reporter the other day: "I think now that, if I were standing where I was fifty-three years ago and journalism was what it now is, I should choose as the business of my life that of a journalist. I can see in it greater possibilities than are embraced in other professions."

LADIES AND LAWYERS.

Pretty Club-room in this Country for Women, viz., the New York Lawyers' Club.

Theoretically, says the New York World, the independence and progress of woman is very well, but practically it is as mystical as the wings of Mercury. She doesn't progress and she doesn't have a good time, independent of man. If she goes to the play, she pays for her own ticket and gets a back seat or one up in the gallery, where the air is bad, where non-æsthetic girls munch molasses candy and bumpkins shell peanuts. If she goes to a café alone, she is neglected by the waiter and served with leathery steak, antique rolls and skim-milk. Shop keepers impose upon her, hotel clerks assign her to a room adjoining the elevator, messengers and agents overcharge her, and railway agents reserve for her the sleeping berth over the wheels. It is only when she travels with her brother or father and dines or lunches with her husband that she learns how shamefully she has been imposed upon, neglected and swindled by the world of commerce.

Take her at the club, where she thinks she is enjoying herself, and heed the paucity of comforts and conveniences that surround her. At Sorosis she pays $25 a year for the privilege of attending ten meetings, where she fills herself with occult philosophy and ice-water. Delmonico throws a lunch of common-place sandwiches, ice-cream and pates, alias hash, before her that gives her indigestion for a week. At the New York Ladies' Club she gives $50 a year for the sweet privilege of walking on a white fur rug on club days and lunching a friend in the big empty dining-room at Café Savarin prices. There isn't a comfortable chair in the house for her to sit in nor a writing-table big enough for a letter and the club register. Then there are one hundred and ninety other clubs about town where women meet to discuss Ibsen, music, art, industry, philosophy, tea and gingersnaps at an expense of from $5 to $20 a year.

Success? They are dead failures, every one of them, simply because there are no men. Men are in the minority, the statistician tells us, but they make things go. Their services have been dispensed with in the nurseries and convents, but in every other department of civilization they are as indispensable as fresh air and daylight. The fact is, society can't do without them; that has been demonstrated time and again.

Take, for instance, the Lawyers' Club, in the Equitable building, and take the very first invitation you get to lunch there. If you are a woman, you will have the freedom of the most magnificent suite of ladies' club parlors in the world; if you are a man, it will be your misfortune to be denied admission. A fee of $100 will, with proper credentials, make you a member of the club; but even then it will be impossible for you to enter the ladies' parlor. That is a sanctuary that not even the President has ever entered. This sumptuous retreat belongs to the wives and daughters, the sisters and cousins, who come to the club to lunch or dine with the members. The host accompanies the ladies to the little entry, rings a bell, and resigns them to the parlor maid. The suite in which they await the announcement of dinner consists of a parlor, bath and toilet cabinet. The parlor is a square room, after the style of Louis XV, with a parquet floor and a magnificent fireplace of Mexican onyx. The walls are done in ivory wood, the panels of which, like the garlands and ribbons in the decoration, are finished in gold. Sconces of French gilt hold electric burners, and on gloomy days a hardwood fire brightens the hearthstone. In summer the furniture is enameled willow. Just now the polished floor is carpeted with a rich Persian rug, hangings of citron and pomegranate silk drape the windows and doorways, and the tints in the furniture are also after the Persian.

Nothing like the ease and comfort of these chairs and couches has ever been approached by a strictly woman's club.

The library hangs on the wall. It consists of two shelves of enameled oak finished with gold, each containing seventy volumes. Paper covers? Not one. Every book is a beauty—in calf, print and paper—and every one bears at the lower edge of the back "Ladies' Parlor, Lawyers' Club." And such a collection! It is a most graceful tribute to the intellectual taste of the sex. Among other authors there are the best editions of Dickens, Thackeray, Carlyle, Lytton, Reade, Lamb, Young, Sterne, Eliot, Lecky, Scott, Campbell, Pope, Addison, Ingelow, Irving, Swift, Prescott, Browning, Longfellow, Whittier, Bryant, Lowell and Tennyson. There is neither cover nor key to the library. The books are selected for the ladies, and belong to them while guests of the club.

Another curious luxury is the pretty little enameled writing table, stocked with the finest note paper, the nicest pens and the most flowing ink imaginable. On the writing-tray there is a silver cruet filled with sand! Think of that, you unfortunates of the Ladies' Club, who haven't facilities for writing a card or a dispatch, notwithstanding the promptness with which you pay your dues.

The room par excellence is the marble bath. It is frequently the case that a lawyer's wife or daughter is accompanied by a non-resident, who comes from the dock or depot to breakfast or lunch. She is travel-stained and uncomfortable. This the attendant sees at once, and without a remark prepares the bath, and when the big, open, cream-colored tub is half full she informs the visitor that "Madame's bath is ready." And such a bath! It is worth an ocean trip just to get a lawyer's idea of what a bath should be. The stone tub is lined with a fresh linen sheet. Instead of a pair of projecting faucets that pour the waters down, there are a couple of silver wheels that force two streams up, spring fashion. The soap is matchless in quality, and you should see the bath-mittens, and the assortment of towels from India, Turkey and Ireland; and above all, the bath-robe, with hood and girdle, to throw over the fair Suzanne while she is having her hair dressed. In a wall cabinet there are the creams, benzoin, aromatic vinegars and kindred lotions that go to perfect the bath of a woman of refined taste.

When luncheon is announced, the visitor is conducted to the dining parlors of the club, where she is served in Café Savarin style. No check is presented, no tips are mentioned. It is charged to the loving brother or husband. The cost is a fifth less than the regular Savarin bill of fare, and the service is the very perfection of culinary art. Every dish is a feast, and each course is a little banquet. A lunch at the Lawyers' Club is an event in a woman's life, for these gentlemen of the law are royal hosts. One gets more than a meal. She is regaled with wit and wisdom as well as "wittals," and is made to realize the queenly creature woman is.

It is not surprising that the fair guest so honored should desire a souvenir of the occasion, however reprehensible it may be for her to resort to petty larceny. So far no charges have ever been made, but it is a fact that stoppers have been missed from the scent-bottles, cakes of soap, powder-poufs, doilies, wash-rags, oyster forks, salt basins, after-dinner spoons, and other pieces of small table furniture are pilfered and carried off to all sections of the globe by the fair friends of these cosmopolitan club men.

Men may smoke and storm and swear, throw arrows, break lances and cut capers, but they do understand the art of dining, entertaining and worshipping. Without them woman is only half herself, and generally superfluous. Her independence isn't worth the flip of a brass farthing. She is helpless and usually half-starved.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

Laugh, and the world laughs with you, but not always—if you are a farce comedian.

Verdi is composing an opera, the libretto being written by Boito and founded upon the adventures of Falstaff.

Sim Reeves, the veteran English, tenor is juggling with an offer of $60,000 for fifty concerts to be given in Australia.

"Young Cashall proposed to Olivette last night," said the soubrette to the comedian in the wings. "How did she treat him?" "He didn't get a hand!"

The high stiff hat which Dick Golden wears in the 3d act of Old Jed Prouty, is said to be 105 years old, and looks like a Cunard smokestack with a flat rim around the bottom.

"I think you made one mistake in your drama." "What's that?" "Why, you have the scene in the coal mine where the men are imprisoned lit by occasional flashes of lightning."

A comedy-drama entitled The Irishman is shortly to be produced on an elaborate scale by W. H. Power and H. S. Taylor. The play is full of realistic scenes and depicts modern life in Ireland.

The Black Flag, Fun on the Bristol, Muldoon's Picnic, and Uncle Tom's Cabin almost complete the list of American productions touring the British provinces, while English productions are to be found in this country by the score.

The managers of the Star Theatre, New York, are contemplating closing their theatre for the week following the conclusion of The Senator's run there, in order to increase the stage facilities for the accommodation of The Soudan, the big Boston success, which goes to the metropolis after the termination of its season at the Hub.

Eugene Field declares that Mme. Belle Cole, the American contralto, drives the finest equipage in London, and adds: "You put a spirited, thoroughbred English horse in front of a light-running American vehicle, containing a handsome, well-dressed and cool-headed woman, and the effect upon the British public is simply electrical."

When Brigham Young invited Mlle. Rita Sanganello to appear at Montana, he fixed the charge of admission at one fowl, and a supplementary pigeon if the fowl was not as plump as it might be. The night's receipts amounted to 700 fowls and 50 pigeons, and the dancer had no reason to complain when she was paid her equivalent in cash at the rate of 16 shillings per fowl and 9 shillings per pigeon.

In "Nihil Deferens" (in nothing different) is the motto that will adorn the crest of A High Roller, the new character Clay M. Greene is to introduce to theatregoers next season. The motto has no bearing on the production itself, which will be, "In Everything Different," but merely covers the characteristics of the central figure in the story, the scapegrace son of a member of blue blooded English nobility.

The sensation created by the wealth of scenic splendor, world of novel effects, hosts of startling features, marvelous lions and legion of players lavished on the grand dramatic pageant, Claudius Nero, continues unabated at Niblo's, New York. Not since the early sixties, when the whole populace of the big city was attracted to the theatre by the never-to-be-forgotten Black Crook, has the theatre been favored with such audiences as are now nightly held within its historic walls.

Andrew Lang, in Harper's, writes of As You Like It as follows: "It is Shakespeare's happiest comedy, most equable, least boisterous, richest in the music of Amiens' bird-like songs, heard in the enchanted forests of Arden. Here we have the gentle poet in his kindest humor; here we meet the dearest and most woman-like of all his women, the merry maiden 'so many fathoms deep in love.' Parting from her and her company, we part from the friends whom we can never miss, whom we can always rejoin, loves that can never be lost, and the joys of the golden world."

Book Chat.

Information of a wide range and various nature regarding books and authors can be found in The Bookworm. It is a treasure of old-time literature and includes much of modern matters of interest.

Dr. Julian J. Chisholm, of Baltimore, by inspecting the Babylonish cylinders in the British Museum, has discovered that the street costume of a society woman who lived 2,300 years before Christ was very similar to the costumes worn by the ladies of to-day, even to the tight-fitting waist and sleeve and the accordion clinging skirt.

A sensible memorial will be that dedicated to Wilkie Collins. It will consist of a small library of choice fiction, to be presented to the "People's Palace" in London. Fifteen hundred dollars has already been raised for this purpose.

French authors on cremation or burial: Zola—"Leave the thing to the decision of the loved ones we leave behind." Daudet—"Either one would be disagreeable to me." Francois Coppée—"I will go to sleep in the cemetery." Henri de Bornier—"Hang you, you spoiled my dinner!" Leconte de Lisle—"I desire neither the one nor the other." Sylvestre—"I prefer the ground, from which flowers spring for lovers." Sarcey—"If I die in Paris I will be cremated there." Jules Simon—"My children will choose the method which will give them the least horror." Sardou—"Burned! burned! It will afford me great pleasure to be burned!"

A man who, feeling poetry within him, resolves that it shall be felt rather than heard, may claim the honor due to a noble self-abnegation. Toward such the muse, we may suppose, feels an arch and peculiar tenderness; for, although professing to renounce her, human frailty leads them now and again openly to invoke her, and to strive with somewhat unready tongue to voice her inspiration. She marks their embarrassed wooing with a secret smile and affects coyness, but, perhaps, loves them none the less for their timidity. She is theirs in spirit, though not in form. "Our union," she says to them, "can never be fully acknowledged before the world; but the bond between us is nevertheless a vital one, and hereafter in the higher life its integrity shall be vindicated."

Some curious examples of the use of letters as metaphors may be found in the works of Lightfoot and Weststein. We often hear of a person having a "stigma upon him." A Stigma was formerly the branding iron used by the Greeks for marking their criminals. It was in shape not unlike a small figure five (5), and was usually applied upon the forehead, cheek or back of the hand, where it would not fail to be noticed. The Hebrews are said to have used their final letter, tau, for a similar purpose. See Ezekiel ix., 4. In the Talmud it is fabled that the Book of Deuteronomy came and prostrated itself before God and said: "O Lord of the universe, Thou has written in me Thy law, but if a testament is defective in some parts it is defective in all. Behold Solomon endeavors to root the letter jod out of me. Neither shall he multiply wives." See Talmud (Sanhed., xx., 2. Bible Deut. xvii., 17). "Then," says the Talmud, "the Holy Blessed God answered 'Solomon and a thousand such as he shall perish, but the least letter shall not perish out of Thee.'"

Professional Chat.

Obsolete laws play the same part in reforms as the memories of the men who enacted them.

The speech of Claudius, engraved on plates of bronze is yet preserved in the town hall of Lyons, France. It was discovered in 1528, on the heights of St. Sebastian above the town.

The title of "doctor" was invented in the twelfth century, and was first conferred upon Imerius. William Gordenio was the first person upon whom the title of doctor of medicine was bestowed; he received it from the College of Asti in 1329.

A prominent clergyman gives the following description of the life of a minister: "My experiences with churches make me think that ministers are like cats. When you go to a new place first, everybody says: 'Come pussy! come pussy! nice pussy,' and you come. Then they begin to rub your fur and say: 'Poor pussy! poor pussy!' and then say, 'Scat!'"

"My idea of heaven," remarked Col. Bill Glenn last night, "is a place where two lawyers, who thoroughly understand the case, argue before an able Judge and impartial jury. Just argue, and argue, and argue—" "And never finished the trial?" "Never. A verdict would put an end to my idea of happiness, which consists in the intellectual struggle. No, sir; a verdict would be the other place."

Poor ministers in England have a source of revenue which we charitably hope will not be accorded to their brethren in this country. Instead of salting down their old sermons in barrels they send them to the booksellers, who gets as much as $5 a hundred for them. A London dealer offers 4,000 sermons in job lots at this price, and if they are written in "a large, bold, plain hand" they bring more.

In a queer letter to a sculptor, written in Potsdam in 1752 by Voltaire and lately published for the first time, occurs this characteristic passage: "Enjoy life, if you can, and leave everything else alone; most of all my medallion. I think I have already told you that I am nothing; 'dignusque numismate vulus.' I may be a face, but I have not got one; I am only a boiled apple on the neck of a crane. There is no way of engraving such. Besides, you may believe that at the Court of a great King I have learned to despise human vanities."

I think a man once wrote a book with the apparently paradoxical title "Humors of the Law." Yet do you know the law really has its humors? and even the parchment faces that hold down the woollacks in judicial dignity have been known to crease and crack in sardonic humor. We all remember the story of the Western justice who told the hope-inspired prisoner that "if the merry children play around the blazing hearth till you return they will be at it six months," and then sent him to a living tomb in the penitentiary. This was cruel humor. But there are other phases. In the current number of the New York Civil Procedure Reports, Vol. 19, No. 1, figures as the footnote of the report of the case of Green against Bolt, tried in the County Court, the following remarkable sentence: "The appeal in the case of Green vs. Houser was decided by the General Term of the Superior Court of Buffalo, April 24, 1890, and the opinion filed by it is reported in 18 N. Y. Civil Procedure Reports at page 354. The same conclusions are reached by that Court as are arrived at by the decision here reported, and the same arguments and course of reasoning are used in both opinions to sustain the conclusion expressed in part by a singular coincidence in almost identical language." Judge Seaver wrote the opinion in Green vs. Bolt, last reported, and Judge Titus that in Green vs. Houser, first reported in Vol. 18, last number. Judge Titus says Judge Seaver borrowed his language and reasoning, but Judge Seaver points with conscious pride to the fact that the case of Green against Bolt was tried in the Court of Sessions in March, whereas the Houser case, though first reported, was not argued until April and his opinion was written first. The legal fraternity are hard at it guessing who wrote that opinion.

A Russian physician is credited with the invention of an instrument by which persons totally blind are able to perceive light through the sense of touch. The instrument converts light rays into a thermo-electro current, which is perceived by the nerves of the skin covering the forehead when the apparatus is placed upon that part of the body. The sensations produced by the instrument are thus described by the inventor: "The presence of an illuminated object is manifest in the preceptive field as a sensation of warmth. The degree of sensation of warmth increases with the approach of illuminating object and vice versa. A movement of the feeling of warmth toward the right shows that the light has moved to the left and vice versa. If the warm area moves downward the illuminating object is moving upward and vice versa."

NOTES.

Lucretius, the sublime poet, but ill-natured man, once said, "It is delightful to see other men in a great storm."

The President entertained the officers of the Brazilian squadron at Washington, last week. It is said to have been a brilliant affair.

Mrs. Elizabeth B. Custer is in appearance a slender little woman, delicate to fragility, who looks as if she could not have endured for a day the life of privation and hardship which she chose to share with her gallant husband for years.

A Canadian clergyman has advanced the theory that the walls of Jericho fell from the blowing of the keynote by the horns of the besiegers, just as bridges have been kitown to collapse from the rhythmic tread of soldiers' feet passing over them.

All inventions in machinery, all discoveries in science, have the ultimate effect of reducing the lifetime price of a bare living. Under invention and civilization the time will come when the average individual will be allowed by society to live a year in exchange for three months or less of his savings of past life.

Down to the depth of 200 fathoms, where daylight disappears, the eyes of a fish grow constantly bigger and bigger. Beyond that depth small eyed forms set in, with long feelers developed to supplement the eyes. Sight, in fact, is here beginning to atrophy. In the greatest abysses the fish are mostly blind, feeling their way about entirely by their sensitive bodies alone over the naked surface of rock at the bottom.

It has been made a rule by a newly-established fashionable hotel in San Francisco, that all the waiters must be clean-shaven, in accordance with the prevailing custom in England. This is to give assurance to the guests that in tasting the soup to see if it is properly seasoned it has not been strained through the waiters' mustaches and thus the disagreeable contact with varicolored hair in one's broth obviated.

Man is to man all kinds of beasts—a fawning dog, a roaring lion, a thieving fox, a robbing wolf, a dissembling crocodile, a treacherous decoy and a rapacious vulture. The civilest, methinks, of all nations, are those whom we account the most barbarous; there is some moderation and good nature in the Toupinambaltians, who eat no men but their enemies, whilst we learned and polite Christians, like so many pikes and sharks, prey upon everything that we can swallow.—Cowley.

Last week it became necessary for a Rocklin Justice of the Peace to issue a foreign summons by publication. The complaint was evidently against some sweet-toothed prowler about the town, who, after running into debt as far as he could, "jumped the town." That no mistake might be made, the Justice not only published the summons as the law requires, but also had the complaint published, which the law does not require, and the complaint, as furnished by the plaintiff, is in the following form: "Rocklin, August 5, 1890. Mr. George F. Gardner, to P. Pringle, Dr. 1890, June 19, to candy 25c; June 23, to cigarettes, 5c; June 13, to candy, 15c; June 25, to candy, 10c; June 27, to cigarettes, 5c; June 30, to board 4 weeks and 3 meals, $20.74. Total $21.34. As more fully appears by the complaint on file herein above to which you are referred." It would be a rarity to see what "more fully appears by the complaint on file." It is safe to say that Mr. Gardner struck some of the Rocklin girls who are fond of candy, and then sought to teach them cigarette smoking, when suddenly he found himself bankrupt.

We once knew a chronic invalid, who, whenever she was asked how she was, replied: "Oh, I enjoy poor health." The are some bereaved people who seem to find a bitter enjoyment in their desolation. They nurse and coddle their woes. They frown new relations and new pleasures from their side. A traveler in our day would never suspect from the present appearance of Mount Vesuvius that a river of lava had run down its side more than once, carrying destruction and death as it flowed. Trees, vines, flowers, orchards, sprout out of the very bed of the old river of ruin, and old Vesuvius seems to hold both its sides, like Laughter in Milton's poem, and to tower in jocund prosperity. Yet all the while Herculaneum and Pompeii sleep the sleep of death there at its foot. And no one can foretell the date of the next outbreak of death. Just so new growths of joy sprout out of bereavement itself, and we are not wise when we uproot them as fast as they appear, under the false conviction that in destroying them we are loyal to vanished pleasures, or because we apprehend a new visitation of sorrow.

'Tis sometimes natural to be glad,
And no one needs be always sad,
Unless he wills to have it so.

FLASHES.

When it comes to a question of society the best is not always the cheapest.

If you want a man's candid opinion of you, make him angry and you'll get it.

The world may despise a kicker, but it is interesting to note that it keeps its shins out of his way.

Honor is like a palace with a low door, into the which if anyone would enter he must first stoop.

If a man be not so happy as he desires, let him take comfort in this, that he is not so wretched as he deserves.

There are so many people in the world who laugh all the way home and stop as soon as they reach the door.

An overdressed woman is criticised, a neatly dressed woman is complimented, and a slovenly dressed woman is pitied.

Wife (waking suddenly from sleep)—Henry, did you call. Husband (who had been spending previous evening with the boys)—No, I'll raise it five.

What sweetness and brilliancy are to flowers, what freshness and clearness are to water, what melody and harmony are to sound, such is purity to the heart.

The Coming Carnival.

The ladies of St. Paul's Church are making extensive and elaborate preparations for a grand Cosmopolitan Fete or Carnival to be held at the Clunie Opera House, January 12th to the 17th. The floor of the Opera House will be boarded or floored over. All the important countries or nations will be represented by the costumes of the ladies taking part. The full details of the entertainment will be given later on. This carnival, they say, will far eclipse the grand entertainment given nearly two years ago at the Armory.

Marysville Citrus Fair.

The California Citrus Fair opens at Marysville, January 12th, 1891. The fair will be thoroughly represented by exhibits not only from the district, but from all parts of the State. We urge upon Sacramento to send a full representation of her citrus products. There will be a large premium list, but this should not be the inducement for a grand exhibit. Our pride of local resources must prompt us to give an exhibit worthy of the county.

H. H. Bancroft.

It is a source of pleasure and pride to Pacific Coast people to know that our own historian, Hubert Howe Bancroft, stands in the very front rank of America's distinguished literary men. That wonderful historical series, which it has taken so many years to complete, has made him famous the world over. A brilliant array of eminent scholars of Europe and America, including Herbert Spencer, Huxley, Dr. John W. Draper, Emerson, Bryant, Holmes, Howells, Wendell Phillips, Whittier, Longfellow, Sir Arthur Helps and scores of others whose names are familiar to book-loving people, have come forward and testified to their appreciation of his genius. Diplomas and complimentary certificates from scientific and literary institutions have been showered upon him. Yale College has conferred the honorary degree of Master of Arts. That powerful and independent journal, the famous London Times, The Thunderer, devoted two whole columns to a review of Bancroft's works, and England's most dignified journals have discussed at length each separate volume as it appeared. Now comes the news that Hubert Howe Bancroft has received a number of votes for a place among the famous "Immortals," an honor that those who know what the "Immortals" are will appreciate.

A new work which the author has been engaged on for years has just appeared from Mr. Bancroft's pen. It is called "Literary Industries," and is the graphic story of a great achievement told by a master hand. The nature of the work is such that it will have a remarkable sale, especially on this coast, where many of the people mentioned are well known. The work is to be sold by subscription, and the publishers want responsible agents to receive orders. We call attention to their advertisement under Help Wanted.

The Old World Off Its Hinge.

"A cynic friend who found himself a little upset in a recent discussion with me on the marriage question, thought he would do as men always do when they are worsted—i. e., change the subject by asking me what I thought of the common-sense underwear? I said I didn't think it was worthy of consideration and I fully understood the feelings of the old lady who came to town and was entertained by her daughter by being taken to hear a woman lecture on reformed underclothes in the afternoon, and to Bob Ingersoll at night. When they got home the daughter said: 'Well, mother, what do you think of it?' 'Good gracious me,' answered the old lady, 'what is the world coming to? No Saviour and no shimmy.'"

DRAMATIC NOTES.

Gus Williams and John T. Kelly in U and I will, it is said, enable us to laugh on the nights of December 15 and 16 at the Metropolitan. The company includes some very bright artists.

Clara Morris held the boards for a season of three nights in Camille, Renee de Moray and Miss Mutton. She is a great emotional actress. In many respects an innovation on the conventional artist, particularly in her rendition of "the sick Parisian queen." She dispels our former ideal of the Camille of our youth, and makes her a coarse, abrupt and often brutal woman. In Renee de Moray Miss Morris is great, all her wonderful dramatic and emotional powers are brought out.

Marilana by the McNeill Club was a success. Mrs. Brune, while not possessed of a strong voice—rather, a strong stage voice—has a sweet voice and winsome manner. At first timid she soon gains confidence and wins the admiration of her audience. Miss Thurston would make an excellent representation of a boy if she could only hide her girlish modesty a little more. In voice she is good. W. H. Kinross is an artist, and it is unfair to compare him with amateurs. Wilkie sings well, but has little dramatic power. All in all, the company presenting Marilana is far above the average operatic companies on the road. The chorus and orchestra was the best we have yet heard in our amateur performances. To-night the third presentation of Marilana will be given at reduced prices, 50 cents for dress circle and parquet, 25 cents for family circle. All who attend can be assured of a pleasant evening's entertainment. Albert Hart is stage manager and knows his business.

The Locomotive Engineer's Story.

"It is a sad story," said an old railroad man, as he coughed two or three times. The group of his listeners who had been hilariously telling some funny experiences a few moments before quieted down.

"I was runnin' old 142," he continued, "and Bill Sikes—you all know Bill—was firin'. We was takin' the flyer west and had orders to run clean through, 'less we were signalled. I think the roadmaster was aboard, and we all knew that if we should pull up without a rattlin' good reason he'd be after us.

"We was runnin' almost full head, I guess, for I know the breeze just hummed when I jogged the cab winder a little. The old engine rocked just like as if it was on the briny deep, only faster. Well, we was goin' lickety split up through the northern part of that town that used to stand by the bend. Bill was shovellin' coal like a good one and I gave the whistle a toot now and then to let folks know we was comin'.

"As I was sayin', boys, we was just scootin'; going round the curve, too. Just then I cast my eyes as far up the track as I could see, and right then I saw something that brought my heart right up in my mouth. I shook all over. Bill saw the thing as soon as I did, and Bill's eyes bulged and his ha'r stood right up.

"There was something on the track. I could just see a little white sun bunnit and a calicker dress, and a little red ribbon peekin' out from a bunch of as pretty golden curls as I ever see."

The old man stopped. He swallowed mysteriously a number of times and drew his horny palm across his eyes. The group of listeners only moved forward a little and held their breath.

"I couldn't stop, boys. It was no use. The flyer was heavy, and we was goin' nearly sixty an hour. When I got strength enough to push in that throttle and slap on the air—we'd struck. We stopped. Bill and me jumped out and shuddered as we did."

The group of listeners turned away sick at heart.

The old engineer went on: "I picked up a wig of golden hair, and Bill two or three pieces of straw and an old sun bonnet.

"Just then a gang of ragged imps stuck their heads from behind an old barn and howled: 'Did you ever, ever, ever git left?' " The group who had listened in horror to the old engineer's sad story looked tired and faded away.—Albany Argus.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY OF Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of E. M. STEVENS, an Insolvent Debtor. —E. M. Stevens, having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in Insolvency, from which it appears that he is an Insolvent Debtor, the said E. M. Stevens is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said E. M. Stevens, insolvent debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution; and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers; and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an Assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to such insolvent to him or to any person, firm, corporation or association for his use; and the said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered, that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Hon. J. W. Armstrong, Judge of the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the Court-room of said Court, in the County of Sacramento, on the 26th day of December, 1890, at 1:30 o'clock p. m. of that day, to prove their debts and choose one or more Assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered, that the order be published in the Themis, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the day set for the meeting of creditors. And it is further ordered, that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.
W. C. VAN FLEET,
Judge of the Superior Court.
Dated November 19th, 1890.

"Hello! Hello!! Hello!!!"

"Well; what is it?"

"How is your mother, this morning?"

"Very much better; she had a real restful sleep last night; she is almost rid of her night-sweats, cough and nervousness, and is growing quite cheerful. How grateful we all are to you for that bottle of medicine."

"Don't speak of gratitude. What does the doctor say?"

"He says he never saw so wonderful a change in such a serious lung trouble. He still thinks we are giving his medicines. I don't like to tell him."

"That's right. He's an old friend, you know. I'm sure your mother will get well now; but you won't forget the name of the medicine, will you?"

"Never! Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery" are household words already, and it has come to stay. Do come and see what sunshine it has brought already, and let us thank you again for it."

"I will. Good bye."

The foregoing is a fair representation of a very common occurrence. "Golden Medical Discovery" has cured severe, lingering coughs and arrested Consumption, or Lung-scurful, in thousands of cases after doctors have failed and other medicines have been tried and abandoned as useless. The "Discovery" is guaranteed to benefit or cure in every case, if taken in time and given a fair trial, or money will be refunded.

The Society Kiss.

Oh, every one knows what bliss in a kiss is,
That's given and taken with plenty of love!
It's one thing at least that never amiss is,
That no one's below and no one's above.

But save us, good Jupiter, save us from kisses
Society ladies exchange when they meet!
For clanniest, coldest of courtesies this is—Sans sympathy, sugar, and served without heat.

Motion one—purse the lips just ever so little;
Motion two—stick your head out, your model a snake;

Then dab your opponent—as if lips were brittle,
And using them roughly would cause them to break.

Retire in good order, composing your features

To look like a statue or death-mask of wax—

There! you have all the rules by which the dear creatures

Reduce to a science their kissing attacks.

The Oldest People on the Globe.

Mr. Stanley found them in the very heart of the great Dark Continent—a race of queer little people not more than four feet high.
They are the oldest race known, and from earliest times they have never gone away from their home. Near a place called Avetiko, on the Ituri river, his men found the first pair of these tiny people. Mr.
Stanley named the little man Adam and the miniature woman Eve. Little Adam was four feet high and Eve a little less. He may have weighed about eighty-five pounds, the color of his body was that of a half baked brick. The little man talked very briskly by signs and gave many proofs of his quick understanding. After this Stanley and his men passed through about two villages inhabited by this ancient and tiny folk, who have been able to hold their own land for over fifty centuries.

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
A. J. JOHNSTON, Managing Editor.

This happy day, whose risen sun
Shall set not through eternity,
This holy day when Christ the Lord,
Took on him our humanity,
For little children everywhere
A joyous season still we make,
We bring our precious gifts to them,
Even for the dear child Jesus' sake.

Thursday the Christian world will observe the eighteenth hundred and ninetieth anniversary of the birth of the Savior of mankind—an anniversary day that has been celebrated since the year 138. It is the great Sabbath of the year; a day of rest and cheer—and better, one on which humanity becomes humane. 'For little children everywhere a joyous season still we make; we bring our precious gifts to them.' Let it so be and ever continue. Let it be that no child, however humble, will be disappointed that Santa Claus overlooked the little stocking. Let it be recollected there are many in this world unfortunately situated; many whose little ones may be overlooked. When manhood comes upon us; when we get into the current of business life, we forget much of our childhood. However it is, cold and selfish as men become, we remember years back Christmas eve, when papa and mamma stayed up late, when we kept awake awaiting Santa Claus, and when we awoke early and found he had made his surprising visitation down the chimney. Can we ever forget our meeting with mother next morning, when we showed her our presents? We adopt the language of an early writer: "Let the external decorations and the superficial forms of this anniversary fade and fall into desuetude, or be replaced with newer glories, as fashion and caprice may dictate; but let not the spirit of Christmas, at once holy and festive, ever evaporate from our feelings, or be chilled by a non-observance of this happy season. Let the laurel—the symbol of peace and good will—be green in our hearts, though it no longer adorn our parlors. A proper observance of the prescribed religious duties, hospitality and social brotherhood; an interchange of love—promoting presents; the festive board; the blazing fire; the moderate bowl, enlivened by music, wit, and song; the harmless sports and pastimes for which none are too old who find a reflected pleasure from delighting the young, or who can renew, even for a single evening, the pleasant memories of their own childhood; but above all, that enlarged philanthropy which prompts us to look beyond our own circle of smiling faces, and to light up a similar gladness in the cottages of the poor by seasonable acts of charity—these are the observances which every man, to the extent of his ability, is strictly bound to maintain; for they constitute the noblest way in which a Christian can commemorate the Founder of that religion which inculcates universal love." We never were enthusiasts on the subject of Christmas presents. It has come to be too much of a tax on the resources of most of mankind to comply with this modern custom. But after all we feel happier when we have honored this custom and given some presents to those we hold dear. There is a feeling of gratified vanity, too, when some friend remembers us on Christmas day. The great trouble in these modern times is the fact that costly gifts have taken the place of the heart offerings of former days. We often hear that stale joke regarding the wife's gifts to her husband, wherein the laugh is supposed to come in at the point where the money comes out of the husband's pocket. There is no joke in this, nor room for merriment. The husband, it may be true, furnishes the wife with money for household expenses, and if she, bless her dear heart, manages to save a quantity of the allowance, and purchases for her husband a present, it is something to be proud of. Anyway, the wife has the right to control a portion of the earnings and her womanly disposition to buy presents for her husband is not "funny," but shows that true and loyal devotion which becomes woman better than a diadem. There is a class who are apt to be forgotten on this happy anniversary, those who should be remembered above all others because they must so soon pass away. The old, those whose days of festivities and merrymaking have long since gone, too often find no place in the excitement and rejoicing of this Christmas season. And yet they would appreciate beyond all others the gifts, however simple, which would show that they still are cherished in the kindly recollections of those who have taken their place in the pursuits and pleasures of the world.

A notable man among the pioneers of California passed away at Lincoln, on Thursday of last week. Colonel Charles Lincoln Wilson was born in Maine, on July 11, 1813. He arrived in San Francisco in December, 1849, in the steamship Oregon, and in the spring of 1850 brought the first steamer that traversed the upper waters of the Sacramento river, to a point above the mouth of the Feather river and as far as Deer Creek, where Peter Lassen had located. Lassen was an early settler, and from him the county of Lassen took its name. After years had passed, the point of landing of Colonel Wilson's vessel became the Gerke ranch, and in later years has become the place where Senator Stanford planted and established the vineyard now of world wide fame—the vineyard near Vina. The little steamer of Colonel Wilson was freighted with goods for trading purposes, and at that time he purchased a league of land from Lassen, which he retained until his death. In 1853 he built a plank road in San Francisco, from Kearny street, near Market, to the Mission Dolores. A fine engraving of the scene of that part of the road which was crossed by a bridge, over the low grounds at Mission Creek, now hangs in the residence of the late Colonel Wilson, at Lincoln. It would be an interesting relic for preservation by the San Francisco Society of Pioneers, if it could be secured. In 1854, Colonel Wilson conceived the idea of building a railroad in this State, and went East. He was the pioneer of railroad enterprise on this side of the continent. In the issue of this paper of Dec. 14, 1889, we published a communication written by Mrs. Theodore D. Judah, in which she gave this narration of how it came that her late husband became identified first with the overland railroad project. Judah had successfully engineered seemingly impossible railway projects in the East, and had acquired a reputation that was widely recognized. Mrs. Judah writes in her article to which we have referred: "When Colonel Charles L. Wilson came on from California in 1854, fired with the idea of an enterprise like the railroad from Sacramento city to Negro Bar (Folsom), the rich placer gold diggings on the American river, these gentlemen (referring to prominent men in New York), with others, said to him: 'We know a young civil engineer, just the man for you, if you can get him.'" They telegraphed for Mr. Judah, who was then at Buffalo, and he came to this coast and undertook works of internal improvements which, while he lived not to see their accomplishment, have united the East and the West of the North American continent. To neither Judah nor to Wilson has deserved credit been given. They projected a railroad from Sacramento to Marysville by a route crossing the American river near where the town of Folsom was subsequently located. Colonel Wilson transferred the road from Sacramento to Folsom to the Sacramento Valley Company, and took upon himself the construction of a road from Folsom to Marysville. In 1859 he completed the road to Lincoln, a town that he founded and to which he gave his middle name. Subsequently he graded the road from that point to the Yuba river and ironed it as far as the Bear. All this he accomplished without the aid of any subsidy, but by his force of character and the credit which confidence in his abilities commanded. At this stage of his railroad career, circumstances compelled him to transfer his railroad property to the Central Pacific Railroad Company, and later on, under that management, the road has been projected into Oregon and connected with the East. After his retirement from the California Central Railroad, Colonel Wilson retained his interest in the town of Lincoln, but of late years devoted his attentions to his extensive farm at Nord. He was a gentleman of commanding presence and of a broad and comprehensive mind. He was much ahead of the times in which he lived, foresaw that which was to come, but which single handed could not be accomplished but in part. To-day it is, and for years it has been, that colossal fortunes have been reaped through the foresight of Charles L. Wilson and T. D. Judah. That men live who have knowledge of their achievements and who accord them the credit they deserve, who give them their appropriate place in the history of this State and nation, is somewhat of satisfaction. It happens that both the editors of this paper are familiar with the important part of the life career of Colonel Wilson—one having been reared at Folsom, the other at Lincoln. We appreciate the shock that the suddenness of his death has occasioned, and feel there has been a removal of one the State could little afford to lose.

Congressman Morrow made some good points in the House on Thursday, regarding the Steamship Subsidy Bill, and its great benefit to this coast. This coast will derive more benefit from its passage than any other section of the country. "It may not be generally known," said he, recently, "that next to New York city, San Francisco, Puget Sound, and even Honolulu, harbors more American ships than any other points of this country. There is more American tonnage than in Philadelphia, Boston, or Baltimore. The passage of the subsidy bill will prove an inestimable benefit to San Francisco and the entire Pacific coast. Business will receive a tremendous impetus, and shipping will be brisk between our shores and the hundreds of little isles in the Pacific."

Always at the convening of the Legislature a gang of thieves and robbers appear as an adjunct to that august body. All the recent thefts and stand and deliver robberies can be attributed to this influx of the lawless crowd who gather here for shelter during the winter. There is no occasion for any newspaper sensation, such as has heretofore been created, but a little firmness on the part of the people, and a trifle of vigilance by the officers. We should be able to stand up the robbers.

CALIFORNIA IN 1837.

PART II.

Wednesday, 1 March. This morning were sailing with a fine wind in sight of the entrance of the Bay of San Francisco. Outside of the entrance there is considerable sea. There is here a bar, sometime a little troublesome. The entrance is about a half mile wide. The fort which once commanded the entrance is very eligible, but is now entirely neglected. Messrs. Slocum, Brothie, Birnie, Lees, and Richardson, Captain of the port, were here waiting our arrival, and came off to us in a boat. At one o'clock P. M. anchored in Whaler's Harbor, on the north side of the bay.

Thursday, 2 March. After breakfast the Loriot sailed for Monterey; on board Messrs. Slocum, Birnie, Lees and Young. The latter goes to get an interview with Gen. Vallejo on the subject of driving out cattle. I came off with Capt. Brothie and Richardson to the Laura.

9 March. Rode with — Farwell to examine the Presidio and fort. These buildings were erected, I was told, about fifty-five years ago for the accommodation of the Spanish garrison. The Presidio is a building, the walls of adobes and the roofs of tiles, enclosing a square area, the sides of which are perhaps three hundred feet long. Since the expulsion of the Spaniards in the revolution, the place has been going to ruins. One entire side is fallen and parts of the others. All of the outer buildings, of which there were many, are now fallen except one. It is now inhabited by a half dozen families, too indolent to do anything to arrest the progress of decay. A sort of military burlesque is here still supported at times. I found the fort which once commanded the entrance of the bay in the same ruinous condition. Some of the cannon bore inscriptions dated A. D. 1648. Ruins, however diminutive, are melancholy mementoes of human blindness and folly. These humble ruins, thought I, vie not with those more extensive and magnificent found in the old world, but are equally indicative of debased propensities. I am not gazing upon the ravages of war. These are simply the ravages of time—of a little time. A little circumspection and industry would have averted all. But so it is: One American colony, supposing itself aggrieved has dissolved its connection with its transatlantic parent, and assumed a "separate and equal station"—has risen to grandeur and happiness; another, without the same causes of complaint, and without the essential qualifications in itself, ventures upon the same experiment, and sinks down into an anarchy more abhorrent than despotism. Spotted mares are generally broke in and much esteemed on the following account: All the horses of a band follow her, attracted by her peculiarity of color, and are not so likely to stray abroad. Horses are here made to work by a leather thong fastened to the draught and round the pommel of the saddle, so that all the draught is upon the girth. Thus tackled, the driver mounts his horse, not doubting but he takes the world in the easiest manner. Everything possible is here performed on horseback. If a man drives oxen he must ride.

Sat. 10. Mr. Young, Mr. Birnie and Mr. Lees returned from Monterey. Gen. Vallejo declines having anything to do in giving us permission to drive out cattle; says that it is the prerogative of the civil Governor. The latter is at Santa Barbara.

Monday, 12 March. Gen. Guadalupe Vallejo came aboard the Laura; was saluted with five guns, and on taking leave, with a like number. Mr. Young sets out to-morrow or next day for Santa Barbara.

April 5th. Crossed the bay of San Francisco to Whaler's Harbor in the Laura. Here she anchored. Dr. Marsh, Padre Quihas, Mr. Birnie, myself and a drunken crew proceeded in a boat to Mr. Reed's farm. The tide being low, a part of us were forced to land and walk about 4 miles. Dr. M. alone remained in the boat with the crew. A drunken being, Long Jim, was unable to carry a bundle of goods and was indebted to me for carrying a part, which by no means contributed to my comfort. About three-quarters of an hour after dark we reached the farm thoroughly fatigued. A substantial supper was set before us as soon as it could be prepared. Mr. Reed being absent, the Padre, of course, became first in authority. He freely circulated several bottles of wine which had been presented him at Yerba Buena, saying it was given him and he would distribute as freely. As I sat in a house of antique construction, looked upon the primitive manners of the Father, the unaffected hospitality of our hostess and the convivial hilarity of all, feudal recollections passed rapidly through my mind. I felt myself transported back to former centuries, and mingling in the transactions of an age that is past. Truly, this people seemed to be, as Santa Anna said of them, "a century behind the rest of Christendom."

6 April. Padre Quihas having procured horses, about 9 o'clock we set out for San Raphael, and remained there that and the ensuing day, being treated with that free and cordial hospitality which we may well conceive to have prevailed a hundred years since in Europe. This mission is poor and decaying. The buildings, though spacious, are very rude and inconvenient. It was originally a rancho of the mission of San Francisco. About forty years since it became a separate mission, under the superintendence of a very strict Padre. So punctilious was he of wasting anything that, I am told, he would not suffer the tools used in erecting the buildings to be ground. The mission, I believe, numbers about nine hundred Indians. The stock has been in a good measure divided among the Indians on their little farms. But they are so extravagant that it is thought they will soon have none, unless taken from them, as has been done at other missions.

8 April. Dr. Marsh, James Black and myself set out for Cooper's Mill, and camped between it and J. Martin's.

Sunday, 9. Reached the mill 11 o'clock.

Tuesday, 11. Returned with the two Indian boys and Gay and Bailey as far as Martin's farm.

Wednesday, 12. Reached San Raphael and remained the thirteenth.

Friday, 14. Crossed the Bay with Mr. Thompson.

Wednesday, 8 May. Took passage in the ship Sarah and Caroline, Capt. Steele, for Monterey, anchored in Whaler's harbor.

Thursday, 9. Worked out of the bay and at night lay off Santa Croix, which it was intended to enter but it was too late when we reached there. The barque Kent also lay near us.

Friday, 10. Reached Monterey about 11 o'clock.—was moderately seasick on the passage.

Sat., 11. Went ashore and took my lodging at the house of Mr. Spence, where I was treated with much politeness.

Sunday, 12. Mr. Young came into Monterey, having returned from Santa Croix, on his way from the south to San Francisco. His horses were left at Santa Croix. He has, after much difficulty, got permission to drive out seven hundred cattle under the condition that we purchase them from the government, that is, cattle of the Missions on which the authorities have unjustly seized. The Governor, not willing to assume the responsibility himself, laid the matter before the deputation then in session. The latter, after some debating, refused permission. On a second attempt, however, the motion carried. And all this rumpus on account of an old colonial law yet unrepealed, which forbids the exportation of male and female animals from the colonies. It is due to Gen. Vallejo and Gov. Alvarado to say that they exerted their influence in opposition to this narrow policy, as also did the Padre Presidente, not as one of the deputation but by his private influence with its members. Monterey is extremely irregularly laid out, if, indeed, it can be said, to be laid out at all. The presidio here is going to ruins. Business is almost stopped. Everything bears the marks of confusion and anarchy.

Monday, 13. At 3 o'clock P. M. left Monterey with Mr. Young and Dyer. Slept at the Salinas.

Tuesday, 14. Having no horse, bought one which was young and badly broken. Being unwell, I was thoroughly tired before reaching Dye's still-house, about five miles from Santa Croix. Passed in sight of this place but not near enough to examine its buildings. At night had a high fever. Took a dose of salts. Never perhaps have I been so tired from a day's ride.

Wednesday, 15 May. Remained at Dye's branding horses.

Thursday, 16. Traveled a very narrow and mountainous road. Drove our horses with difficulty. Camped about 8 miles from the Pueblo de Santa Clara, now sometimes called the Pueblo de Alvarado.

Friday, 17. Took breakfast at the Pueblo and proceeded as far as the Pulgas Rancho (Rancho de Pulgas) or rancho of flees.

Saturday, 18. Reached Herba Bueno.

Thursday, 24. Mr. Young crossed the bay to see Gen. Vallejo, who was appointed agent of the government in selling us cattle.

Saturday, 26. Oneal, Turner, Despau and Erquette came across the bay.

29 May. Mr. Young returned from San Solano, having purchased seven hundred cattle at $3.00 per head, to be received 200 at a Rancho of San Francisco and 500 at the Mission of San Jose.

1 June. Took leave of Herba Bueno and camped 1/2 league beyond the Mission of San Francisco. Calling at the Mission to see the Administrador, he used every means to evade giving us 170 cows and 30 bulls, wishing to increase the numbers, saying that his Mission was due that of San Solano that number of cows and bulls. Mr. Young returned to get the orders translated and proved it to be correctly written.

Friday, 2d. Mr. Young returned, the Administrador having consented to comply with the order. Passed a very difficult road to a rancho about 25 miles to the S.W. on the sea coast.

Sun., 4 June. Moved about a league to another corral.

Wednesday, 7. We have been detained here until this morning. The Administrador has been collecting cattle. Some have been confined in the corral since Monday morning without food or water. We however got off this morning by paying the Administrador 1 rifle $30.00 value, 6 shirts $2.50, and $20.00 cash, to be divided, as he alleged, among his Indians. The whole was, however, an exaction he had no right to make, it being the custom of the country for the vender of cattle to assist in driving them off the rancho. For the above consideration he insured our number as far as a rancho called St. Martin's, being a small peninsula on which the cattle were easily guarded, and as we afterwards learned a part of the Mission land. No fresh water under a half league—cold and windy—cattle suffering much from thirst, and drinking salt water.

Thursday, 8. Left early this morning—had difficulty in counting the cattle. Mr. Y. had a sharp altercation with the authorities. Retained but five men to assist us, whom we dismissed within nine miles of Santa Clara. The others had been dismissed at the Rancho of the Pulgas. One dollar to each of them we retained. Reached the Mission of Santa Clara at dark with the loss of three cattle which had tired out, and with much difficulty got our cattle into the corral. Ate nothing all day. A couple of reals procured us a little brush by which we raised a little fire and broiled a little wretched, partly dried meat. Slept in the corral with our animals, a partition separating us and the horses from the cattle.

Friday, 9. Started before sunrise. Passed the Pueblo de Alvarado, and a half mile beyond allowed our animals about three hours to feed. Camped at the rancho of Don Hijare, having with much difficulty got permission to put our cattle in the corral, his Donship being drunk. Just before sunset, as some of the men were driving the cattle towards the corral, they took fright, and were with much difficulty got back and driven into the corral. Three or four were probably lost. Ate nothing during this toilsome and perplexing day, except a few morsels of bread at the Pueblo.

Saturday, 10. Moved early, stopped for breakfast about a mile beyond the Mission of St. Joseph's, and reached the rancho of Robert Livermore, 16 miles distant.

Sunday, 11. Guarded the cattle. Mr. Young returned to the Pueblo.

Moved 16 miles to an old thrown-down corral—partly repaired it. Guarded the cattle at night.

Tuesday, 13. With an elk and bullock skin tied up the corral.

Sunday, 18. Went to a valley within a half mile of San Jose and encamped.

Tuesday, 22. This morning received the 500 cattle due from this Mission. It has been the desire of the Administrador to collect up all the wild cattle possible for us. While making his collections, those first put in the corral have been starving, some of them seven days without either food or water, except when guarded out a few minutes at a time. Some were so feeble from starvation and others so crippled from rough usage, that we left eleven unable to travel the first league. The Administrador agreed to supply these at the Mission sheep pasture; but when we reached there, he said the cattle had all gone off and now we must either return to the Mission or take an order on some rancho on our way. We did the latter, as it was impossible for any of us to leave our band. About sunset reached a lake or flag bulrush pond, where we guarded the impatient cattle on horseback all night, half of us guarding while the others slept. Last night I rode to Livermore's, 16 miles, after sunset, and returned by sunrise this morning—was on horseback all day and half the night. One young cow being crippled, tired out, and being fat was killed a league from camp, and partly eat for supper.

Friday, 23. Moved early—ate breakfast at Livermore's. At dark reached the corral where our other cattle were, and with much difficulty got them into the corral. Of the 200 cattle left here only about 118 remain. They broke out of the corral last night. Tonight we were forced to use the utmost vigilance to prevent them from breaking out—did not lie down to sleep until a half hour before day, having been all the time walking about the corral.

Saturday, 24. In the afternoon moved about a mile to an open plain, where they can be guarded more securely.

Sunday, 25. Moved 16 miles and camped on a slough of the San Joaquin.

3 July. Started to the Pueblo; was there the 4th, fifth and sixth; returned to camp.

20 July. This afternoon finished swimming the cattle across the San Joaquin, at which we have been engaged since the 12th. A corral had previously been made on the bank to prevent the cattle from scattering abroad. On the 12th we drove them in and immediately made an effort to drive the cattle across, but the water being deep at the going in, they took fright and refused to swim. We now caught a few calves and towing them across with skin lariats, succeeded in driving their mothers across also, a few heifers only, following. On the 13 we made up our minds for a desperate effort. In the morning, mustering all our force we determined to make an energetic effort to do what all perhaps augured a hopeless experiment. With about seven hundred wild cattle in the corral we got on our horses and began the attack. Being unsuccessful we dismounted and tried on foot; still in vain. We now, with logs, brush, etc., made another fence, dividing the corral, and driving the cattle into smaller part again to get them into river; but they bore down our partition fence instead. Some got outside of the corral altogether, and it took much care to prevent them from bearing down the main corral. We resumed our partition fence and strengthened the main corral, preparatory to another trial, and crowding the cattle into it, called all hands to the charge. We this time succeeded in getting nearly all of them into the river. Some got half way across, but nearly all returned to us except seven which reached the other side, two being caught by the canoes and seventeen which were drowned. In these sallies when we huddled up the cattle on the bank and had formed a circle around them, then came the "tug of war." Jump as we would, strike as we would, bawl as we would, threaten as we would, our line was broken. A furious bull would anon rush by, horning and kicking. We were exposed to a broiling sun and enveloped in clouds of dust. The later article was seized upon by the sweat and we soon presented faces hideous enough to appal either man or beast. Finally we abandoned our object, stretched a rope across the river, and began to catch the cattle with the lasso and tow them across the river by means of bulrush boats pulled by the rope stretched across. On the boats were seated two or three men, some to pull and some to hold the cattle. Two, three or four were taken at one time. Skin canoes were first tried, but did not answer so well. Most of this time I have been guarding the cattle on the north side. This business is extremely hard, the party being divided. On this side I have guarded generally half the night and sometimes nearly all, on horseback, after toiling in sweat, water and great danger through the day. Meantime, the mosquitoes are so abundant, except in the heat of the day and the coldest part of the night, that it was difficult to breathe, and the animals were, of course, very impatient and hard to keep. This afternoon Mr. Young and the main part of our camp came across and here a new misfortune crowned all others. Mr. Young was driving the cattle with a few men to a new camp. I singled out the pack animal that usually carried our powder, from the rest of the horses, to follow the cattle thinking to secure the ammunition. Driving her along the margin of a bulrush or tule pond she turned about, and in chasing her, Benj. W. run close upon her outside, and she rushed into the pond and threw off her load, and everything was completely wet, powder entirely lost. Horrors! how we chased the cattle until after the moon rose to get them across a little water, not more than knee deep. And then the state of camp! Shut the book! The last month, what has it been? Little sleep, much fatigue! Hardly time to eat sometimes! Cattle breaking like so many evil spirits and scattering to the four winds! Men, ill-natured and quarreling, growling and cursing! Have, however, recovered the greater part of the lost cattle and purchased others. Another month like the last, God avert! Who can describe it?

21 July. Sun about two hours high in the afternoon, set out for Herba Bueno to procure a supply of powder. Slept at R. Livermore's, about 20 miles from camp. 22nd. Reached the Pueblo de Santa Clara. Was kindly entertained by William Gularack. 22. Reached Herba Bueno, a distance of near 60 miles. 23. Set off between 10 and 11 A. M. and reached the Pueblo late at night. 24. Passing the Mission of St. Joseph's, contracted with Mr. Forbes two horses, one of which I was riding and the other left at Livermore's. The sale for cattle on good terms. Reached Livermore's with Mr. F. and learned that the horse left there was stolen. 25. Two Spaniards, who had engaged to be here by this time, did not comply with their engagement. In the afternoon sent Gay to camp to procure help. 26. Received near 20 head of cattle, and with the assistance received from camp and the two Spaniards, who had now appeared, reached the corral on the bank of the river about sunset. 27. Early in the morning crossed the cattle with some difficulty and about 12 o'clock took leave of the river San Joaquin with the hearty delight of those who are exchanging localities without the possibility of suffering by the exchange (Adios, San Joaquin!)

14 August. Reached the Jesus Maria (Buena-ventura) with 729 cattle, having lost 15—five drowned and ten tired out—and killed two for beef, making us less 17 since leaving the San Joaquin.

Wed. 16 and Thurs. 17. Lay encamped; part of the men hunting elk for provisions. Succeeded in killing some. Dried the meat.

Friday 18. Moved one-half mile to the Buenaventura and encamped. Dressed the feet of the lame cattle, perhaps doing the cattle, upon the whole, more injury than good, besides tiring the horses in chasing them with the lasso. About ten or twelve Indians approached within about three hundred yards of camp. They were shy and four only ventured into camp. We understood them to say that they had once had some difficulty with Mr. La Frombois and that he had killed some of their people. They soon left us.

Were unarmed except with bows and arrows. One having his bow strung was made to unstring it.

30 August. This morning the cattle and horses being recruited by rest and good pasturage we resolved to try the long dreaded passage across the largest river on our route. Our past difficulties at smaller rivers could not augur well of this. We, however, succeeded without difficulty or loss at a ford discovered the day before. Admirable! every lip said and every heart responded! In about two hours came upon the trail of Mr. La Frombois, which intend following. This morning began traveling among the mountains which separate the valley of the Tulares from that of the Chastas—had some difficulty in following the trail. We have now taken leave of the valley of Tule or Bulrush. Its length is said to be about 500 miles and its breadth upon an average of 60. The soil, so far as my observation extends, is of an excellent quality and immediately on the banks of its rivers superior to any I have seen on the Pacific coast. At this season it presents a parched and uninviting appearance. Large tracts are covered with pebbles and a great portion of the valley is subject to annual inundations, of which fragments of pine wood and bark where pine trees do not grow is sufficient evidence. The climate though sometimes very warm is upon the whole fine, particularly the sea breezes which fan up the evenings. Its commercial facilities are admirable. The greatest defect is want of timber, there being scarcely any except dwarfish oaks along the margin of the streams. The intermittent fever sometimes fearfully prevails. Mr. Young informs me that with a trapping party he passed one summer here without having one man sick, but that on his trip to the Columbia 3 years ago with Mr. K— every one of the company, himself included, had this fever. We have in our party had two or three cases. On every hand we see revolting signs of its fearful ravages. About 4 years it prevailed with such mortality that the few survivors of a village sometimes fled from their homes leaving the village literally strewn with the dead and dying. Mr. Y. says he saw hundreds lying dead in one village forsaken by the few survivors, and birds preying upon the uncovered carcasses. This disease seems to have prevailed with like fatality from the Bay of San Francisco to the Columbia river on these fatal times. Previous to 1829 it was unknown in the Columbia. Its greatest mortality seems to have been from about 50 to 100 miles interior. Still the Indians in this valley are numerous. They do not bury their dead, but carry them a few hundred yards from their houses and leave them exposed. Skulls and bones are scattered all around their villages. They live principally upon roots and grass plants. Their abundant use of the latter have led the Californians to say that they live on grass. They appear to be peaceable, and though shy of us have offered us no injury except in two very doubtful cases. The horse guard one night fired on what he took to be an Indian stealing a horse. On another night one of the men said that an Indian crept into camp and stole his gun, but he pursued him and recovered it. Of neither instance have we proof. Their mildness is as much, perhaps, the consequence of want of energy as of any more worthy cause. The men cut off their hair and live most frequently naked.

26 August. Since last date traveling in the mountains. They appear every day to grow more difficult. Hills peep over hills and alps on alps. The grass is so generally burned that our animals have become feeble. Our cattle have learned their mastery in the brushy and mountainous road. Our horses are so exhausted from the same causes that they are of more trouble than service. Yesterday as the forward cattle were drove down to the river to drink, being much heated and the bank steep, they got into swimming water and crossed. Nor were they stopped until about a hundred of the best cattle in the band were across. The water being very rapid it was difficult to get men and horses over. Before we had succeeded the cattle, weary as they were, had gained the summit of a mountain several thousand feet high. With much difficulty they were recovered. Several of us started in advance to hunt a camp. Myself up the bank, and until I rose the mountain, made for the road. Turner and Tibbets found one, though not good, which we reached after sunset. To-day the mountains grow more brushy, steep and rocky. To-day we have reached a place where there is water but no grass. Unless grass is found to-morrow, we have every prospect of starvation to our animals. A tremendous mountain rises before us which we vain would have attempted, but Mr. Young, having rode up it for some distance, returned in half an hour swearing that "a still higher mountain was on the top of this." "Now," said he, "if you are a philosopher, show yourself." Animals were of course hard to guard where there was nothing to eat. Some of the men being tired of eating dried meat insisted on killing a beef. Mr. Young did not consent, as he very reasonably did not wish to carry the meat over the high mountains ahead. A very rough and disagreeable quarrel ensued. Some had sworn they would kill one at all events. Mr. Young defied them and told them to "kill one at their peril."

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

Modjeska comes back from Poland next year.

The musician is the only man who can with any safety try the experiment of living on "air."

The Fast Mail is the title of the new sensational melodrama. It is said to have a number of sensational effects, and in addition to this it has a strong cast.

So clamorous are Boston theatre goers for the continuation of The Soudan that Manager Eugene Tompkins of the Boston Theatre has been obliged to forfeit large sums to managers in other cities who had claims on the production, in order that he might satisfy the demands of the amusement lovers of the Hub. It now looks as if the play would fill out the remainder of the Boston Theatre's current season.

Denman Thompson and Messrs. Gilmore and Tompkins of the Academy, New York, have almost decided to yield to the great financial pressure exerted on them by out-of-town managers to permit The Old Homestead to leave the big Academy after the current season. If the owners of the play so conclude, The Soudan, the great Boston success, will be put on at the big Academy for a whole year's run, beginning in August.

With one exception, every crowned head of Europe has witnessed the exhibition of Professor Darling and the lions, included in the host of attractive features which distinguish Claudius Nero, the dramatic spectacle which will tour the big cities after its retirement from Niblo's December 13th. Messrs. Locke and Davis, the owners of the pageant, pay $1,000 weekly for the services of six lions, the dog "Nero" and Professor Darling, of which, of course, the Professor receives the lions' share, as well, incidentally, as that of the dog.

Book Chat.

Zola seems to think that he can immortalize himself simply by his persistent efforts for a place among the Immortals of the French Academy. At least the lurid author says he will press his claim until success or death comes to him and that the world of Paris will applaud his persistence. Zola may reach the same fate that befell Daudet, who turned on the Society in his famous "Immortels."

"The Demoniac" is an unnecessarily disagreeable production. There are, no doubt, thousands of men who die of drink every year, and many who plead inherited tendency in palliation of their vice. But there is nothing essentially appertaining to the career of such persons to entitle them to figure as the motif of a work of literary art, and if Mr. Besant is simply inditing a prohibition tract, he should call it by that name. Moreover, the best medical opinion now inclines to the belief that inherited dipsomania, in the ordinary acceptance of the phrase, is a delusion; that it doesn't exist. If this is so Mr. Besant has not a leg to stand on. I see the story is issued in London as a Christmas annual. Now, whatever else it may be fitted for, fitted for Christmas it is not. It is not humane, it is not hopeful, it is not strengthening and it is not true.—Hawthorne.

Professional Chat.

The first day Artemus Ward entered Toledo, travel-worn and seedy, he said to an editor who was in the street: "Mister, where could I get a square meal for 25 cents?" He was told. "I say, mister," said he, "where could I get the 25 cents?"

Senator Carlisle of Kentucky, and Thomas Carlyle, the great Scotch philosopher, are said to be from the same family, despite the dissimilarity in the spelling of the names. The members of the family are able to trace their lineage back to the days of good King Alfred—more than 1,100 years ago.

At a moment when the battle of Sadowa was as yet undecided, says the Municher Zeitung, and when, indeed, the Prussians appeared to be losing ground, Bismarck was wandering over the battlefield like a soul in agony. Certain historians have gone so far as to say that he kept a loaded pistol in his holster for the express purpose of blowing out his brains if the Austrians had won the day. Presently he fell in with Von Moltke, who was quietly looking on at the fight. Being anxious to arrive at an idea of the exact state of affairs, he pulled out his cigar case, in which only two "Londres" were left—one of them extra good and the other of very inferior quality. He handed the case to Von Moltke who, after examining the cigars for a long time, silently helped himself to the best. That was enough for the Chancellor, and he remarked to some one near at hand: "When I saw Von Moltke use such deliberation in choosing his cigar, and, above all, when he chose the best, I knew that was a sign that things were going well with us."

NOTES.

The women are beginning to carry about with them an air of secrecy, while the children's eyes are bright with happy expectation.

The man who knows it all is bad enough, but he isn't a circumstance to the man who knew it all beforehand and who says afterwards that he told you so.

The public is not long sizing up those young men who stand on the corners and blakguard and brag on themselves. Their real worth is so small that it would slip through the eye of a cambric needle and disappear in the mist.

When you make chocolate now of an evening sprinkle a little cinnamon on top after the chocolate has been poured in the cup. It adds the same piquancy and charm that nutmeg adds to lemonade, lemon juice does to Vichy, sliced lemon does to tea, or, to come nearer home, that salt does to an egg.

We often hear a fellow bewailing his bad luck. It might be more in accord with the true facts if something were said about his bad management. One of the strangest of human freaks is that a man who cannot manage his own affairs is always clamorous to have charge of public offices and places of financial trust.

"You can't empty a hot, soft-boiled egg into a thin cup without cracking it, nine times out of ten, unless you follow a little trick I picked up," said the wise Blanquet. "It is this: Before you open the egg put your spoon in the cup. Why? The heat follows the spoon upward and escapes." Simple, but it doesn't cost anything to try it.

Alcohol gets its name from the Arabic alkohol, the powder of antimony, with which the people in Asia stain their eyelids. This powder is very fine and pure, and the name was in time given in Europe to alcohol, because it is a pure extract; but the Arabs never used the word in that way. In other words, that signification of it was unknown in Arabia.

We acknowledge the receipt of the announcement of the 16th annual dinner of the Associated Pioneers of the Territorial days of California, to be given at New York, January 19, 1891, to celebrate the 43d anniversary of the discovery of gold at Sutter's mill. While we cannot be present in person, we will be there in sentiment. Let there be merry-making.

Miss Ray Frauk is one of the first Jewesses to preach in the synagogue in modern times, for, notwithstanding the fact that Miriam and Deborah preached to women, and Huldah preached to men as well, the prejudice against women preachers is greater among the Jews than in any other congregation. Even female choristers are not allowed in the orthodox synagogue.

The Dutch have an original as well as novel way of collecting the taxes. If after due notice has been given the money is not paid, the authorities place one or two hungry militiamen in the house, to be lodged and fed at the expense of the delinquent taxpayer until the tax is paid. It is needless to invoke any other form of action, as the defaulter soon produces the tax to get rid of the hungry guards.

An ancient legend says, that when mankind were dispersed by the confusion of tongues, Ilaig, a martial son of Togarnah, a son of Gomer, a son of Japhet, went to dwell at the foot of Mount Ararat, and from there ruled the surrounding country. The descendants of this warrior call themselves "The Ilaiks," but as one of their early chiefs was named Armenak, they are known to foreigners as the Armenians.

Indian dialects have done much in the introduction of new sounds in our language. To illustrate, these are a few of the counties in the new State of Washington: Klickitat, Chehalis, Skagit, Skamania, Yakima, Wahlikikum, Kittitas, Snohomish. The American Red Man has not lived in vain, and his revenge on the white man is something terrible when it is considered that the latter must go on trying to pronounce such names as the foregoing forever.

Another fond delusion has been shattered by the relenting data of science. Whisky has long been regarded as of value in the treatment of pneumonia, but a comparison of the results attained in different hospitals by its use in this capacity shows that its employment is not desirable. It is found that in the New York hospitals 65 per cent. of the pneumonia patients die under alcoholic treatment, while in London, at the Object Lesson Temperance Hospital, only 5 per cent. die.

The Orphan.

What a magic power there is in some words! Flashing along the electric chain of ideas and relations, they thrill the bosom with emotions. The words that have this thrilling power are comparatively few, and still fewer retain it long, if in common use. Among the rare terms of exhaustless pathos we reckon this—The Orphan.

An orphan! How mournful the sound! What images does it conjure, of desolation and dejection, of pitiful faces, steeped in tears, of homeless little creatures, children of sorrow and acquainted with grief, with bare feet, treading alone the slippery paths of youth.

The orphan! Pronounce the word anywhere, at any time, and it sweeps over the chords of the soul like a funeral dirge. It speaks to the heart, rather than to the ear. It tells of childhood, fatherless and motherless; it tells of a loneliness which the world cannot cheer, of a sadness which sympathy cannot solace, of a heart bitterness which strangers cannot assuage.

"He is an orphan boy," are words which with moving eloquence appeal to human nature. They bid every man act the father's part, and every woman show the mother's heart. They say to everybody, as with a divine authority, "Deal gently with the lad! Is he needy? Succor him his heart-burthen is heavy enough. Is he homeless? Receive him! give him a place at your table, a seat at your fireside. Is he wayward? Throw around him the loving, yet firm restraints of parental watchfulness. He is an orphan."

Let us think of the orphan's heart and lot. It will do us good. It will soften our hearts; it will tend to make us contented with our lots; for whose condition is more hapless than that of the orphan?

Enter the place, an asylum it may be, or a farm-house, whither the young orphan has been carried and domiciled. Sit down, and take the sorrowful boy on your knee. Your first impulse will be, if you have a human heart beating in your bosom, to press him warmly to it, while the tear of commiseration drops on his face. It has been just a fortnight since the dying mother imprinted on his cheek the last faint kiss, with lips that were then growing chill, but whose latest love token was given to her darling child, her well-beloved boy. Within a few months the father left his parting blessing with his son, his sole bequest, and died.

Day and night the heart-broken mother had been to her wondering child a spectacle of inconsolable grief. In the evening hour she was wont to fold him in her arms, and caress him with a shower of tear-mingled kisses. She pored the woes of her own bosom into his little being, till it overflowed. But the mother's tears have ceased to flow; her sadly soothing words, her clinging embrace, her tender gaze, the child no longer has. His last light has gone out. Days and nights have passed since he saw his mother's form, lying pale, motionless and cold, in a sleep from which neither his cries nor his frantic calls could wake her. A fortnight has passed of dreariness and darkness. The wan child sits so lightly on your knee, grief-wasted. His eye is dim, the bloom has faded from his cheek, his voice is low and tremulous. He shrinks from your kindest attentions, for the chords which a dying mother so lately touched are painfully sensitive to a stranger's hand. Let us not too closely scrutinize the orphan's heart. Its sorrows are a sacred inheritance, and the stranger intermeddles not with them.

Of the orphan's lot we may more fully speak. He is a child in tender years, yearning for the love of parents, and the endearments of home. It is the frequent lot of manhood to be without father and mother; but we do not apply the term orphan to an adult bereaved of his parents. He is no longer helpless, dependent, and in need of parental care and counsel. These he enjoyed throughout the season of youth. It is the early, untimely deprivation of these blessings that distinguishes orphanage. In the time of childhood, with no knowledge, no experience, no ability or skill, no resources of self-reliance, with but the first lessons of culture, the youth is bereft of his natural guardians, instructors and providers. We call such a homeless child an orphan; and its lot is unutterably forlorn, its loss is irretrievable.

The adult, who has, up to manhood, enjoyed the fostering auspices of a happy home, enters into new connections, domestic, social and secular, which are intended to take the place of those which are dissolved by the death of parents. He is himself the head of a family, and a member of the community. He has launched forth on some business pursuit. He sustains numerous relations. But the child knows nothing of these relations. Life to it is little more than bare existence, and that existence floats on the calm bosom of domestic felicity, basks in the smile of a mother's love, and lives in the light of a father's favor. But when that smile is gone, when that light is extinguished, all is gone, and existence is but a bleak waste. Behold the orphan, if you would see a human being sustaining no relations.

Adults have resources within, as well as relatives without, to sustain them under parental bereavement, their minds have become matured, habits of thought have been acquired, fields of knowledge have been explored, the power of fortitude has been disciplined. The child has no such resource. The world within is more vacant, or more unknown than the world without. Its only word of light is home, and the orphan is turned out of that Eden.

The orphans' lot is one of premature sorrow. Youth is the season of joyousness, of halcyon hopes, of hilarious shouts, and gleeful pastimes with schoolmates. In the morning of life, when the dewdrops sparkle and the merry birds freight the fresh air with melody—at such a glad some season, let not clouds gather over the sky! But alas! the storm suddenly breaks on the scene, and the sportive, sunny boy, is the sad survivor of the overtaken family, a scathed and blighted orphan. He has suffered a loss which can never be repaired. Had fire consumed the homestead, another mansion might soon have been reared on the same familiar spot; had disasters impoverished the family, fortune might have smiled again; had death taken brothers and sisters, other children might have come to fill the vacant places; but the loss of father and mother is remediless. The orphan may find friends, but parents, never more. It is melancholy to think of a child meeting with such a loss.

Antiquity of the Carpenter's Plane.

A very interesting discovery has been made at the Roman city of Silchester. The excavators came across a dry well, which on being explored proved quite a little museum of antiquities. Some fifteen feet down, a Times correspondent says, the diggers found an urn-shaped pottety vase, about a foot in length, quite intact, and, curiously enough, protected by lumps of chalk built around it. The vase which probably originally contained some precious substance, was, however, quite empty. Above it were deposited a great number of iron implements, most of which were in a wonderful state of preservation. They seemed to have been the tools of a carpenter and a coppersmith or silversmith, with some miscellaneous objects of blacksmith's work thrown in. The principal specimen is a carpenter's plane of quite modern type, although unquestionably more than 1,500 years old, three or four axes retaining their fine cutting edges and still quite serviceable, a number of chisels and gouges of all shapes and sizes, hammers, adzes, saws, files, etc. In the smith's department may be specified a brazier for burning charcoal, quite complete, two or three anvils of different sizes and shapes, a fine pair of tongs adapted for lifting crucibles, a curious tripod candelabrum lamp or candle-stick, and several other curious objects the precise uses of which have not yet been determined. In addition there are several large bars of iron, a couple of plowshares, and a broken sword. Probably more will be found deeper down in the well. This is undoubtedly the most important find at Silchester since the discovery of the bronze Roman eagle, now at Strathfieldsaye, some years ago.

The Origin of Visiting Cards.

If one may believe all one reads, visiting cards are of Chinese origin. The story goes that so long ago as the period of the Tong dynasty (618-907) they were in common use in China, and that is also the date of the introduction of the "red silken cords" which figure so conspicuously on the engagement cards of that country. From very ancient times to the present day the Chinese have observed the strictest ceremony with regard to the paying of visits. The cards which they use for this purpose are very large and usually of a bright red color. When a Chinaman desires to marry, his parents intimate that fact to a professional "match-maker" who thereupon runs through the list of her visiting acquaintances, and selects one whom she considers a fitting bride for the young man, and then she calls upon the woman's parents, armed with the bridegroom's card on which are inscribed his ancestral name, and the eight symbols which denote the day of his birth. If the answer is an acceptance of his suit the bride's card is sent in return, and should the oracles prophesy good concerning the union the particulars of the engagement are written on two large cards tied together with red cords.

Two little clouds came into the sky,
One in the east and one in the west;
Gently and wisely the soft winds blew;
Nearer and nearer together they drew.
Edge touched edge when the day was done,
And the two clouds floated forever as one.

Once two hearts came into the world,
One in the east and one in the west;
Wise love guiding, they nearer drew;
Half unknowing, together grew,
Never in life or in death to part—
For both were joined in one great heart.

[For THEMIS.]

Checking Perspiration.

A Boston merchant, in "lending a hand" on board of one of his ships on a windy day, found himself at the end of an hour and a half pretty well exhausted and perspiring freely. He sat down to rest. The cool wind from the sea was delightful, and engaging in conversation time passed faster than he was aware of. In attempting to rise, he found he was unable to do so without assistance. He was taken home and put to bed, where he remained two years; and for a long time afterwards could only hobble about with the aid of a crutch. Less exposures than this have, in constitutions not so vigorous, resulted in inflammation of the lungs, "pneumonia," ending in death in less than a week, or causing tedious rheumatisms, to be a source of trouble for a lifetime. Multitudes of lives would be saved every year, and an incalculable amount of human suffering would be prevented, if parents would begin to explain to their children at the age of three or four years, the danger which attends cooling off too quickly after exercise, and the importance of not standing still after exercise, or work, or play, or of remaining exposed to a wind, or of sitting at an open window or door, or of pulling off any garment, even the hat or bonnet, while in a heat. It should be remembered by all, that a cold never comes without a cause, and that in four times out of five, it is the result of leaving off exercise too suddenly, or of remaining still in the wind, or in a cooler atmosphere than that in which the exercise has been taken.

The colder the weather the more need is there, in coming into the house, to keep on all the clothing except india rubber or damp shoes, for several minutes afterwards. Very few rooms are heated higher than sixty-five degrees when the thermometer is within twenty degrees of zero, while the temperature of the body is always at ninety-eight in health; so that if a man comes into a room which is thirty degrees colder than his body, he will rapidly cool off, too much so, often, even if the external clothing is not removed.

It is not necessary that the perspiration be visible; any exercise which excites the circulation beyond what is natural, causes a proportional increase of perspiration, the sudden checking of which induces dangerous diseases and sudden death every day.

If a person begins to cough, as the result of a common cold, it is the result of nature herself attempting the cure, and she will effect it in her own time, and more effectually than any one can do so, if she is only let alone and her instincts cherished. What are these instincts? She abhors food, and craves swarthy. Hence, the moment a man is satisfied that he has taken a cold, let him do three things: 1st, Eat not an atom; 2d, go to bed and cover up warm in a warm room; 3d, drink as much cold water as he wants, or as much hot herb tea as he can, and in three cases out of four, he will be almost entirely well within thirty-six hours. If he does nothing for his cold for forty-eight hours after the cough commences, there is nothing that he can swallow that will, by any possibility, do him any good, for the cold, with such a start, will run its course of about a fortnight, in spite of all that can be done, and what is swallowed in the meantime, in the way of physic, is a hindrance and not a good.

"Feed a cold and starve a fever," is a mischievous fallacy. A cold always brings a fever; the cold never begins to get well until the fever begins to subside; but every mouthful is that much more fuel to feed the fever, and, but for the fact that as soon as the cold is fairly seated, nature, in a kind of desperation, steps in and takes away the appetite, the commonest cold would be followed by very serious results, and in frail people would be almost fatal. These things being so, the very fact of waiting forty-eight hours, gives time for the cold to fix itself in the system, for a cold does not usually cause a cough until a day or two has passed, and then to wait two days longer, gives it its fullest chance to do its work before anything at all is done. Do not check perspiration. Beware of colds.

Who Don Juan Really Was.

Almost every one has heard of Don Juan and many have seen the pantomime (there are several renditions), or read Byron's work of that title. The name stands as a type of extreme and reckless wickedness. Now, Juan is simply Spanish for John, so there have been many Don Juans or Sir Johns, but the one who gave the name such bad pre-eminence was Don Juan de Marana of Seville. The story in that city runs that after a long career of desperate wickedness Don Juan met a funeral cortege late one night, went with it to the church, heard an affecting sermon on his own life, and saw a perfect image of himself in the coffin. He was for a time demented, but recovered, reformed, led a godly life thereafter, and left all his wealth to a hospital.

The Glacken Case.

Justice Devine, after an examination lasting some ten days of the case of Glacken and Fischer, charged with the murder of Antone Menke, Jr., near Brighton, determined that the defendants were justified, and that they acted in self-defense. The case was one much to be deplored, in that it had its inception in a business disagreement among relatives, and, as is usual in such matters, feeling is more intense than where troubles arise between strangers. In this matter the facts were fully presented by both the prosecution and the defense, and their narration patiently listened to by the magistrate. While there is naturally some disagreement of opinion, we believe the determination of the Justice is generally approved—that had the defendants been held no conviction would be had.

More Wonderful Echoes.

In the Woodstock park, Oxfordshire, England, there is an echo which repeats 20 syllables at night and but 17 in daytime. Another, at Shipley Church, in Sussex, clearly repeats 21 syllables, either in daytime or at night. A watch ticking in the abbey at St. Albans can be distinctly heard the whole length of the church. And still another English echo, that at the cathedral at Gloucester, where an octagonal gallery carries whispers 75 feet, is justly celebrated. An inscription on the walls of the gallery reads as follows:

Doubt not but God, Who sits on high,
Thy inmost secret prayer can hear,
When a dead wall thus cunningly
Conveys soft whispers to the ear.

A White Deer Superstition.

The Indians have a theory that every white deer has a "mad stone" in its stomach. They believe that the "Great Spirit" places this stone in the white deer's stomach to absorb poisons which that delicate animal may take in while eating grass. In 1848, Captain Wilson, of Alabama, killed a white doe. Knowing the Indian superstition he opened the animal and found a spongy stone as large as a man's fist. This stone, as the property of W. B. Somers, of Fort Worth, Texas, has been used successfully in cases of hydrophobia and snake bite.

First Settlers of Virginia.

Dr. Stephen B. Weeks' of John Hopkins University, has made a special study of the early Virginia settlements under Sir Walter Raleigh. He maintains that it can be shown by legendary and historical evidence that the earliest English settlers in the New World were not massacred, as is generally supposed, but were absorbed by the tribe of Croatan Indians, and their descendants are still to be found in North Carolina.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

A Straight Tip will be here on the 24th and 25th inst. This is the most humorous and enjoyable comedy in its line on the stage. Wit of the genuine type abounds. The artists are up to all the necessities. We witnessed the performance at the California Theater last week, and can pronounce it a roaring success.

Little Puck was given last night to a full house. Frank Daniels and Bessie Sanson have added zest and vim to the splendid little adaptation of Vice Versa. Unlike most of this class of farce comedies, there is some of the elements of the drama proper in this comedy. The company is a good one, and each artist has a part that something can be made of. Little Puck to-night again.

U and I is not worthy of a place on the stage. There is neither point nor pith to the alleged comedy. Even Gus Williams and J. T. Kelly did not deem it of sufficient import to interpolate new variety business, but were content to deal out the old threadbare specialties so—ever so long—on the boards. If there was anything which could give rise to genuine mirth in the performance, we failed to note it. There were, however, some clever musical and dancing artists.

Glory and Profit.

"There was an old soldier who was possessed of a wooden leg, and when he didn't happen to have tobacco, as an essential prerequisite to obtaining tobacco, why tobacco he necessarily must beg," quoted an ex-soldier of the rebellion. "It's the old story," he resumed. "Take 6 tolerably prosperous soldiers from an average 100 and you leave 94 poor ones. They saved the country and then worked for a living. Thousands of them went West and took up farms in Nebraska and Kansas and after twenty years' work half the farms are owned by the money-lenders of the East. Anybody who can make anything out of the old soldier is very jealous of his fame, and any given politician who expects his vote will fight like a tiger if you as much as point your finger at him. But he is poor just the same. Every orator extols the old soldier and hoists him in glowing sentences to the apex of the peak of glory, but he isn't advertised for very extensively when there is a particularly soft job on hand. He has got to scrap with the gang for a job.

"Now, where in blue blazes does the benefit come in for the dear old soldier in the $4,000,000 distribution of gains of the great encampment of 1891? He will certainly get a little of the olden glory in making a patriotic spectacle of himself for the emulation of the rising generation; will smell powder and get sore feet amidst the clash of cymbals and the blare of brass horns. But who gets the substantial benefit? Not he, to a dead certainty.

"The street car man will take his nickel in the jam. The hotel man will smile on him and tap him. The merchant will pat him on the back and tell him that money is dross as compared with glory, and will throw in a pair of suspenders with the suit in honor of the old flag. The restaurant doors will smile a broad welcome as they take him in, and the bartender will wink at the regular customers as he listens to the old stories.

"But when the old soldier goes home, if he has got a home, the old woman will take the last kink of victory out of him by inglorious references to certain little matters of work left undone, an empty flour barrel and a lack of meat; very vulgar matters, indeed, after an all night seance with fame and a dear old comrade. But these old women are insatiable, and are sometimes extremely vexatious in their references to common, every-day routine grub matters when a fellow's eyes are dancing with visions of old-time glory.

"Of course, if you are a postmaster, or the holder of a reasonably fat federal office, the old woman will not only wink at an uncommon dose of fame, but absolutely refuse to make any remarks about the condition of your breath. But, ah me! we cannot all be postmasters."—Exchange.

It is said that the original Delmonicos never went to law about an unpaid bill; they trusted to their patrons' sense of honor, and found that they lost no money by doing so. Some of the "dairies" in and around Nassau street have adopted much the same way of doing business. There is no waiter to keep watch of the customers' appetites, to see what this one eats, and that one drinks, and to distribute checks impartially, but each customer, when he has eaten and drunken, tells the cashier what he has had; she tells him what he must pay, he pays it, and that's the end of the little business transaction. It is another example of that paying trust in American human nature that permits the keeper of a news stand to leave pennies and dimes with his papers so that a chance customer may make change for himself even when the newsman himself is out of sight. Foreigners and strangers, seeing the unguarded stands, with their newspapers and their pennies, marvel and say, "Why aren't they stolen?" They're not stolen, whatever the reason may be.—New York Sun.

Brandy, Gin, Rum.
Brandy is made from wine. Alcohol, which is pure spirits of wine, is naturally a liquid without any color and much lighter in weight than water, and it requires a very great amount of cold to freeze it. The word brandy means wine that has been burned, and the only genuine brandy is obtained from wine by distillation. As it comes from the still it is white, and colored afterward by burned sugar, etc. Brandy can be made also from corn and potatoes. Gin is so named from genievre, the name for juniper, the berries of which are used to give it a flavor. The spirit itself is distilled from fermented corn. Rum is distilled from a mixture of molasses, and its name, signifying rich, describes it fairly well. Whisky is distilled from fermented barley. The name is from the Irish word "uisque," meaning water of life. There is found in spirits an oil which is very disagreeable, and so strong that a single drop will flavor many gallons. What is called "proof spirit" is a mixture of nearly equal volumes of pure alcohol and water.

The fact is not so well known as it deserves to be that cream constitutes an admirable nutriment for invalids. It is superior to butter, containing more volatile oils. Persons predisposed to consumption, aged persons, or those inclined to cold extremities and feeble digestion, are especially benefited by a liberal use of sweet cream. It is far better than cod liver oil, and besides being excellent for medicinal properties, it is a highly nutritious food.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY OF Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of E. M. STEVENS, an Insolvent Debtor.—E. M. Stevens, having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in Insolvency, from which it appears that he is an Insolvent Debtor, the said E. M. Stevens is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said E. M. Stevens, Insolvent Debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution; and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers; and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an Assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to such insolvent to him or to any person, firm, corporation or association for his use; and the said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered, that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Hon. J. W. Armstrong, Judge of the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the Court-room of said Court, in the County of Sacramento, on the 26th day of December, 1890, at 1:30 o'clock P. M. of that day, to prove their debts and choose one or more Assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered, that the order be published in the Themis, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the day set for the meeting of creditors. And it is further ordered, that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.
W. C. VAN FLEET,
Judge of the Superior Court.
Dated November 19th, 1890.

A small and almost imperceptible hang nail often involves the owner of the hand which bears it in an endless amount of annoyance and vexation. It is the general rule of manicures to the contrary notwithstanding, that the nails that are least attended are better than those that are continually doctored. The man who cuts a hang nail, in nine cases out of ten lays the way for a much more vigorous successor. Satisfactory results are almost always obtained by adopting the habit of pushing the skin back from the nail after washing the hands. The dry end of the towel should be taken, and the skin pressed back wherever it overruns the nail. This breaks its adhesiveness to the nail and makes hang nails impossible. Where the skin is allowed to grow fast to the nail, trouble invariably results, because the nail in growing out pulls the skin with it, and when it breaks from the tension the hang nail is formed.

The Holy Synod of Russia has ordered that persons marrying for the third time shall be put under penance by the officiating clergyman for a period of three to five years, according to the circumstances of the man and the family he has raised with his first two wives. A widow over sixty years of age getting married again is to be placed under penance for two years. Discretion is allowed to the respective clergymen to shorten the stated periods of penance.

Origin of Magpies.

One of the stories told of the Muses is that connected with the nine daughters of Pierios, King of Aemathia, who challenged them to a contest in singing. The Muses consented and fixed the place for the trial at Mt. Helicon, a well-known mountain in Greece. It is said that when the nine mortals began to sing the sky became dark and all nature was put out of harmony, but when the Muses raised their voices the heaven itself, the stars, the sea and rivers stood motionless, and Helicon swelled up with delight so that his summit nearly reached the sky. The Muses then turned the maidens into magpies, who continue to chatter and imagine they make sweet music to this day. The Muses are often referred to in modern literature. Thus in "Paradise Lost:"

Of man's first disobedience and the fruit
Of that forbidden tree, whose mortal taste Brought death into the world and all our woe,
Sing heavenly Muse.

An Odd Coincidence.

An old friend (call him W.) relates how, while he was in Florida, his watch stopped. Since it was a very good watch and had never stopped before, and had been duly wound the evening before, W. was surprised that it wouldn't go. By and by the head of the house (call him B.) came in. "Will you please give me the time?" said W. "Certainly," said B., and he pulled out his watch. B. had a timepiece that was entirely trustworthy, not given to irregularities of any kind. He pulled it out of his pocket. "By Jove!" he exclaimed, "my watch has stopped; that's queer." They compared the two watches, and they had stopped at the same hour and at the same minute, and why they had stopped neither man was able to discover.—Boston Transcript.

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
A. J. JOHNSTON, Managing Editor.

The inauguration of the year eighteen hundred and ninety-one will soon be upon us. That we observe the day that begins a new year is appropriate. It has been so observed by our ancestors as a festival of no little importance; and, as was written by an early author, "It is a landmark or milestone in the rugged journey of human life; or rather as an inn or stopping place for refreshments, at which the wayworn traveler pauses with delight, and then presses forward with renovated hope and vigor." Can we disagree with this writer of the past if we assume he meant upon the pause on New Year's day, there came satisfaction from the year that is past? True it is that New Year's day is a milestone in human life; a day that has well been dedicated to Janus, of old Roman mythology—the god with two faces, one looking backward, the other forward. Truly it is upon New Year's day very many assume the Janus faces. The merchant ledgers up his business transactions of the dead year, and calculates the result of the year approaching. Every mortal upon New Year's day looks backward, ledgers his debits and credits; and looks forward to the new year hoping sanguinely it will make success more successful, or that the shortcomings of the past will be more than overcome by the successes of the future. The new year is burdened with many promises that depend much on fortuitous circumstances. At its ending there may not be the redemption, and many there will be who a year hence would rather the year 1891 had not occupied its place on Time's calendar. Many others will bless it—those upon whom it will have showered fortune. Among all civilized nations and peoples there has been an observance of the epoch of the new year. Its observance is varied with different nationalities. With the Chinese there are protracted festivities, and what is perhaps better, the payment of debts. With them the principle is that a man shall start upon the new year free from obligation, and in that regard equal with his fellows. The Romans dedicated a whole month to Janus and their thoughts and actions carefully bore upon the future—that the succeeding twelve months should augur well for all. Presents were exchanged and it is said that under the reign of the Cæsars these presents became so great a source of profit to the sovereign and so onerous a tax upon the subjects, that they were by imperial decree limited. The custom of New Year's presentations, however, continued, and extended to other nations. The Jews celebrate their New Year's festival at the beginning of the month of Tishri (our September, October), and a distinguishing feature is the blowing of horns, in accordance with Leviticus xxiii, 24: "Speak unto the children of Israel, saying: In the seventh month, on the first day of the month, shall ye have a Sabbath, a memorial of blowing of trumpets, an holy convocation." With the Americans New Year's day is much given to frivolity, yet it would seem its observance, generally, is a combination of the customs of the Romans, the Jews and the Chinese. Following the Romans we have the two-faced Janus—many there are who look backwards regretfully, who pause and lean upon the milestone and make earnest promises for the future—promises they perhaps never will fulfill, but will repeat their follies if in their life travel they reach the milestone of 1892. The blast of trumpets on New Year's eve is a custom peculiar to our youth, and strange it is it has followed down these many ages, and though now done thoughtlessly had origin with the great law-giver. From the Chinese we borrow the festivities of the celebration of New Year's day, though we make them shorter. We make our good resolutions in the morning, but before nightfall there are many Rip Van Winkles, who repeatedly swear off. However it is, the world has little to complain of the year that will soon be dead. It has not been marked with the calamities that have characterized many of its predecessors; to some have come increased happiness, to others memories of bitterness. Let us quote from an article published in the Sacramento Union, of December 31, 1858, entitled "The Requiem of the Year," and written by the late Joseph W. Winans:

Farewell, dark voyager, unto the shoreless ocean of oblivion, farewell! Thou hast done much of good within thy day, and haply much of evil. Thou hast been to some a messenger of mercy, to some a baleful scourge. Thou hast swung the holy censor, and kindled the flames of conflagration. If the sword and the pestilence were wielded in thy heavy hand, thou hast none the less smiled plenty on the teeming soil, brought affluence to want, and made the desert blossom as the rose. It is for Him alone who poises the balance of the universe to weigh thy deeds aright. Whether thy works of blight or benison preponderate; whether thou hast urged along or stayed the march of human progress; whether thou hast purged this guilty globe, or sunk it deeper into crime, none may declare but He who sitteth on the outer circle of creation, beyond the flaming boundaries of earth. Through the channeled aisles and fretted naves of a thousand grand cathedrals rolled the ponderous anthems which swell forth thy dirge. And the voice of nature catches up the sad, sad burden. But sadder still in the lone chambers of the heart, a trampling train of bygone years moves on with hollow tread, and in its echoes wakes the memory of joys forever gone. This is thy requiem, departed year; and thus the burdened spirit takes of thee its last farewell. Vale! Vale!

There are times when we indulge in sentimental and retrospection of the past, as well as let our fancy wander and imagination span the future. The close of the old and approach of the new year is the time for melancholy and for joyous thoughts. Melancholy over the trials, hardships and misfortunes of the past, which often exceed the pleasurable events. Joyous thoughts of what may come in the future. There are few, indeed, who do not cling to the pleasures of hope, and upon this delusive capital build their castles amid ruins of former failures. Most of us have sufficient superstition in our composition to believe some good spirit will interpose her kind offices in our behalf, by bringing wealth and pleasure on the advent of the new year. No matter what clouds of adversity have lowered upon us, that invisible, inscrutable power remains to fortify us into the ultimate realization of fond hope. In youth, maturity and age alike, this kind spirit controls our acts and destiny. The youth, starting out in life, looks forward to a glorious future. At maturity we look backward over the path strewn with misfortune and wrecks, and invoke our guardian spirit to bring us realized hopes in the future. Old age looks backward, but has a very dim view of the worldly future; with age there is only a future after these mortal ceremonies have been discarded and the immortal halo surrounds the body. But a truce to gloomy thoughts—the new year, which comes so quietly, is fraught with bright prospects for our people. Peace and plenty are the watchwords. The poorest have golden opportunities in the future. With THEMIS the past year has been one of success, and we have still greater expectations for the coming year. We wish all a "happy new year."

That was a splendid compliment to our associate, as well as to the people of Sacramento, when Governor Markham tendered the office of Superintendent of State Printing to A. J. Johnston. We give the Governor's terse and flattering letter:

LOS ANGELES, December 20, 1890.

A. J. Johnston, Sacramento, Cal.—DEAR SIR: After careful examination and consideration of the claims of the various candidates for Superintendent of State Printing, I have concluded to tender the same to you. I do this not only on account of your personal fitness for the place and the urgent request of your friends, but also in recognition of the claims of the Republicans of Sacramento.

Very truly yours,

H. H. MARKHAM.

On behalf of Mr. Johnston, who is the managing editor of this paper, the writers, his associates, can say that it is a deserved compliment. For the first time in the history of the State Printing Office a practical book and job printer has been selected for that responsible and honorable position. There are many important trusts connected with the office, and we know whereof we speak when we say that A. J. Johnston is equal to every emergency.

Choose a book as you would a friend. Books should be bought to read, for the learning as well as the pleasure derived from them. It is well for those who can afford it to have a large collection of choice books, but the real book reader only needs those he has the time and desire to read and digest. Too many volumes on the shelves do not inspire literary pursuit, nor does the owner thereof ever read them. It is folly to read works we do not or cannot digest, or understand. The shoddy idea of securing large libraries to boast of, or to point to his admiring guests, shows a want of literary taste, and only discloses a superabundance of ignorance. Books are too numerous now. When rare and choice works were scarce there was an eager hunger for their possession. In the year 690, the Duke of Northumberland gave 800 acres of land for one volume of history. The same with greater amplifications can now had for a few shillings. Two hundred sheep was the price of a copy of the bible. We often hear some people remark that they read everything, and with a show of disgust proclaim that they wish something new would come out, in order that their appetite for reading might be appeased. Such sentiments, if they are entitled to the name sentiment, only disclose a dense ignorance, or at least, hypocrisy. As a matter of fact, the most assiduous reader could not read five hundred pages a week. When we consider that there are about 30,000 volumes of new books published every year, not to mention republications, it is clear that no one could possibly read "everything." The wisest man now-a-days must content himself with leaving the great mass of current literature unread. The best-read man can only have a knowledge of a small percentage of the new books. It, therefore, becomes necessary to read only the choicest literature, and become master of a few good works. This immense increase in current literature, in many instances, causes otherwise careful readers to become careless, and to scan slightly valuable volumes, which leave no permanent impress of their contents on their minds. A man who loves to read owes it to himself to have only the choicest works of literature at hand. The mass of the later day productions are not worth reading, and in the same are found only readaptations of what has been said and written hundreds of times before, only dressed in a new garb. When you see anything good in print, look in some old book and you will find it. It is pleasant to have a fine collection of books, and most gratifying to have a knowledge of their contents. The bookworm has always been a subject of jest, but at the same time of admiration for his learning. Books are our best friends, no matter what may be said.

PART III.

27 August. At daylight this morning we commenced moving camp, and ascended the dreaded mountain and found another on it, after pursuing a ridge about a mile. After ascending this one we had fondly dreamed we would descend into some friendly valley, but when we had gained the summit of this, behold another, and our hearts sickened as we foreboded another still. Our horses were so weak from fatigue and hunger that they were of little use—nay, of more trouble than service. The cattle, too, were laboring under the same disadvantages, and besides were so obstinately lazy that every inch of ground we gained was contested. Howling, bawling, stones, clubs, and everything on which we could lay our hands, achieved every inch of our progress. They would turn off from the road; wander down the sides of the mountain, take refuge in the dense brush, stop to fight each other, and in short appeared willing to do anything but go quietly along the trail. Three horses and some of our best cattle tired down on the road. The day was excessively warm, our faces covered and our throats and noses filled with dust. Great thirst was the necessary consequence of intense labor under such circumstances, but it was impossible to get water. Under these circumstances I reached the point of the mountain where the roads turned down to the river. There were lying some of the men who had driven the first band of cattle. Some of them had gone down the mountain for water. I myself, supposing there was a spring somewhere on the side of the mountain, started in the pursuit; but after going about two hundred yards and seeing no indications of water nearer than the river, about a mile distant, three-fourths of which was down the side of a steep mountain, I returned and persuaded the gentry lying in the shade to return with me to assist in driving up the rear cattle. At last the whole party were rendezvoused at this point and we began to descend, and in about 30 or 40 minutes gained the valley. Traveling about two hundred paces we came to a cool and delightful rivulet. Never had I so suffered from thirst as this day, and now I plunged into it with an avidity which frightened myself. At the first hearty draught it did not have the usual taste in my slimy mouth. I perhaps drank three quarts in fifteen minutes. Short sighted man! Happy that his knowledge is not prospective! Else he would not venture upon some of his most ennobling enterprises. Few of our party, perhaps none, would have ventured upon this enterprise could they have foreseen all its difficulties. It boots little to reflect that the future gains will amply compensate for present suffering. Most of the party cursed the day on which they engaged, and would hardly have exchanged a draught of cool water for their expected share of the profits. We encamped 4 or 5 hundred yards from where we had descended into the river valley, at about 4 P. M. Plenty of wood and water, and some grass. A good beef was killed, a part soon cooked and almost as soon consumed, we having eaten nothing all day. Thrice happy evening, unknown to those who have not known the contrast of the morning! And were it not for that fearful mountain before us we should forget all our toils in our present happy condition; or if remembered, only remembered to endear our present enjoyments. But meantime another quarrel with Wood and Mr. Y. about the beef. Our horses were so exhausted, for the first time on our trip, we guarded them and the cattle on foot.

28 August. Remained encamped during the day to recruit our animals, though there was but little grass. Some of the men returned and recovered two horses that were left by the way yesterday.

29 August. At daylight this morning began our march and ascended a mountain as high as any we had yet encountered. The road as difficult and the cattle as weak and stubborn as on the last day's march. The horses so weak that nearly all the driving was done on foot. Nearly every inch of progress has been gained by the use of clubs, sticks, stones and bawling. When we had gained the summit of the mountain we stopped about an hour for the cattle to eat grass, and rest. The descent was about a mile and a half or two miles, and sometimes very abrupt. When we had proceeded about half way down three Indians came to us, and to encourage us said, "Go on, there are no more mountains ahead." Though not much accustomed to believe in Indian veracity, this assertion produced a shout among us. And "Thank the Lord," came from lips not much accustomed to devotion. The first impulse of my own heart was to hallo aloud and echo the news, the second to exhibit my unusual gratitude to the naked savage who brought us the welcome tale. The happy tidings soon spread along our line and gave us all new life. Even our cattle seemed to catch the prevailing passion and we were all huddled in a trice to the mountain's base. Our animals and ourselves here drank freely of a beautiful stream. Three cows were here left; we suppose they were poisoned on the mountain. We now had about two miles to go around and over the point of a mountain before reaching camp. The brush was very dense and there were several difficult ravines. Every inch was contested and achieved only by the exertion of all our strength. We at length found grass and water, and upon the whole the most pleasant encampment since we entered the mountains. Our labor to-day was only surpassed by that of the former. We did not suffer for water, otherwise it equals any other.

30 August. Lay encamped all day.

31 August. Moved camp, and counting cattle ascertained that we have lost 49 since leaving the Jesus Maria (Buena Ventura.)

3 September. Since the last date we have been making short marches and camping wherever we could find small parcels of grass. Our fond expectation of getting out of these mountains each successive day has been delusive. Lofty mountains have been exchanged for deep and difficult ravines, and our labor little diminishes. I reckon yesterday the most laborious day to myself since beginning the trip, my bones aching and my lungs painful from hallowing. Since last date have been lost seven cattle and two horses. The horses for the first time were suffered to go unguarded last night. This morning found that two horses were missing—one, Mr. Y.'s favorite saddle horse, and one of B. Williams'. The horses were found near the top of a high mountain on our left, whither they had gone in quest of grass. Mr. Y. had much difficulty in driving them down to camp. It was thought probable that the two lost horses had been stolen, but more probable that they had been left by there in the brush yesterday. The cattle were very impatient, having scarcely anything to eat, so that I was kept running all the morning till about ½ past 7 to prevent them from wandering, though not my guard. Moved about three miles, and, finding grass, encamped. Mr. Young, B. Williams and Tibbets returned in quest of the lost horses, and return, sun ½ hour high, after a hard day's walk, having found the two horses. They had been unmolested by the Indians, as well as two bulls tired down by the way, one of which they also brought on. To-day, Turner and Gay went in advance about six miles to examine the road, and report favorably, having found several parcels of grass at which we can recruit our animals. They also opportunely found 130 Indian trade balls—will probably be needed. A repulsive mountain still lies before us. The report, however, is favorable; we may not cross it.

4 September. Moved ½ mile to fresh grass. Camped. Some of the wretched cattle wandered to the very summit of a high mountain on our right, and were got down with much difficulty.

6 September. Remained encamped all day. With the hope of finding mountain sheep and gratifying my curiosity, about 8 o'clock I set off with Henry Wood to climb a towering, stony peak on a high mountain about ½ mile before us. Depo had gone before, and the frequent report of his gun induced us to hurry off, thinking he was in the midst of game. We were upwards of an hour toiling up the mountain, when we gained the summit of ridge which led to the stony peak at which we were aiming. There we were so thoroughly fatigued that we were glad to shelter ourselves from the wind under the side of the ridge to rest, and both in a short time fell asleep. After an hour's rest we renewed our progress and began to ascend the elevation on which stood the stony peak. With much difficulty we clambered up the rocks within 50 feet of the summit. But what appeared one peak from the valley, now proved to be four or five. The ascent of the highest was impracticable, but we gained the summit of the second in height, and were even now sufficiently elevated to gaze with caution upon the fearful depth below. We are now near the summit of a peak which we had supposed, when in the valley, would command a view of the surrounding scenery, but from this abrupt elevation we now saw ourselves encompassed by awful mountain barriers. On every hand "Alps on Alps arise" and mingle with the clouds. There appears but one way of exit, along which it appears we must travel. After rolling off stones awhile to see them tumble and smash below, and being very cold we began to descend. The peak is massive granite. Reach camp in about an hour and a half, tired enough to wish the romantic granite peak at "Nova Zembla," having seen no game at all. Chagrin pour la terre!

6 September. Moved about 8 miles—road very brushy and difficult. Camped at a spring apparently impregnated with ferruginous matter. Traveling along a bank which sloped abruptly towards the river, a loose mare slipped and stopped not till she reached the bottom. On hearing of this, I returned to see if she could be got out, but could find nothing of her. She had probably struggled into the current and been carried away. Poor horses! They have become too weak, and their feet are so sore that they dread to move, and passing along the river to day some crossed to evade their drivers, and they frequently try to conceal themselves in the brush. This is the first encampment, since entering the mountains, known to any of our party. It is said we shall reach Shasta Valley in three or four days. Grass not very plenty. The mineral spring above named possesses purgative properties; animals very fond of it. About 12 Ind. houses vacant.

7 September. Moved about a mile and found a better encampment for our animals than any we have found since leaving the San Joaquin.

8 & 9 September. Lay encamped. Our animals rapidly recruiting. For the last five or six days we have seen no Indians. The country is perhaps the line between the Indians of the valley and those of the mountains, though sometimes occupied by one or the other, or, perhaps, held in common. The Indians of the mountains do not appear to be numerous, having never seen more than 15 at one time. They are unoffending and friendly. I was particularly pleased with their language. The enunciation is peculiarly clear and distinct, and entirely free from the harsh gutturals to which I have been accustomed in Indian languages. Like all American savages before they have had much intercourse with white men, they exhibit a great propensity for long and high toned harangues. That we did not understand them was no consideration. One old man, after seating himself in silence and smoking his pipe with much formality, raised his voice to its highest key and began as follows: "In yonder mountains I was born. There I sucked my mother's breast. There he had grown up," and, doubtless, many other items of equal importance, could we have understood him. I never failed in getting a grave harangue when I addressed one of these mountain orators. We have been frequently scattered along the road for a mile or two, when there was dense brush on all sides and, of course, much exposed. Indeed, we have been much at their mercy, but they have offered no injury, either to ourselves or property. On counting our cattle correctly, ascertained that our present number was six hundred and eighty, making our previous loss less than we had supposed.

10 September. Moved about five miles, and finding excellent grass, encamped and remained the 11th.

12 September. Made a long and difficult march, and gained the long wished for Shasta Valley; began to leave in the rear our old acquaintance, the snowy peak, with feelings of anything but regret. Lost two horses, one of which was a pack animal with a pack on; was found back at camp. After traveling about 3 miles in the valley, we began to feel some solicitude about Wood and Jim, who had returned in pursuit of the horses, and halted for them. In about 15 minutes they appeared, and we pursued our way. Long march to-day.

13 September. Made an early move and halted on a stream—tributary to Rogue's river. We here eat breakfast, gave our animals a few hours to eat and moved until after sunset, and reached a good encampment—distance, 20 miles. Mr. Young had supposed on leaving the place at which we halted for breakfast, that the distance to this place was not more than 3 or 4 miles, but it proved to be 8 or 10. Once started, we were obliged to go through.

14 September. Moved camp about 10 o'clock, and after traveling 5 miles, crossed Shasta river. About 5 miles further, encamped; but little grass and water for our animals. About two miles before reaching camp, five or six Indians came to us in a friendly manner, and one, accompanied by a boy about 10 years old, followed us to camp. There had been frequent threats on the way that Indians would be killed as soon as we had crossed Shasta river, and I had heard threats of killing this one while he was following us. It had generally passed as idle braggadocio, and I was hoping that present threats were of the same sort. I, nevertheless, intended telling Mr. Young. In the hurry, however, of unpacking I could not do it unobserved. We had just let loose our horses and sat, when a gun was fired just behind me. Gay and the Indian were sitting within ten feet of each other, when the former fired. The Indian sprang up to run when Bailey also shot at him. The Indian ran about 20 paces and fell dead, down the hill. Some of the scoundrels now halloed, "Shoot the boy! Shoot the boy!" The little fellow, however, turned a point of rocks, plunged in the brush, and, as he was not pursued, he escaped. They afterwards alleged it was only to prevent his spreading the news. At the sound of the gun, Mr. Young asked vehemently, "What's that?" and began censuring the act. I sprang up, calling it a mean, base, dastardly act, and that such men were not to be depended upon in danger! Bailey retorted, "Are you to be depended upon in danger?" I replied, "Yes." "We'll see," said he. I said, "Yes." Carmichael was one of the first to censure the murder, but he now joined others against me: "We are not missionaries," said he, "we will avenge the death of Americans." Mr. Young and myself soon saw that it was of no use to wrangle. Some of the party were silent—most were in favor of the act. Only one that I recollect spoke against it. Turner, Gay and Bailey were three of four survivors of a party of eight men who had been defeated at the Neat river, and several of the survivors were much mangled. Turner's wife had also escaped. This they allege is their justification. But the murder was committed four days before reaching the place of their defeat, and the Indians may have been of another tribe. Nor could any consideration of private revenge, allowing its legality in itself, authorize endangering the property of others. We must now prepare ourselves for fighting our way through the hostile Indians. This fool act, as Mr. Young said, "lost us half our animals." One act of barbarity is not to be omitted. Camp and Pat stripped the Indian of his skin clothing, and left him lying naked. The Indian had a bow and about 10 or 15 arrows. Only two arrows in the pouch had stone points.

15 September. Moved before sunrise—road brushy and difficult. Had much difficulty in ascending the brushy hill. The cattle were to-day driven in three bands. The first ascended with little trouble. The second, which I was assisting to drive, with more. Some of the third band were unable to get up and were shot by the drivers. The two first herds of cattle had halted until the arrival of the third. After allowing a half hour for rest, Mr. Young gave orders to march. Some of the drivers, however, had become displeased because he had not stopped in the valley below, and now did not pay any attention to his orders. Here a most horrid quarrel ensued. Curses, guns and knives were bandied for 15 minutes. Turner, Gay, Carmichael and Bailey were the principal speakers against Mr. Young. Myself and Depo tried to quash the business; others were silent and apparently indifferent. Here we were, in a most difficult pass, where a dozen Indians might have killed the half of us and numbers of our animals before we could gain a good road, and no doubt we would here have been attacked if the Indians had had time to collect. Property of a very exposed nature was to be protected, and besides we were in equal danger from each other. We now had much difficulty in driving through the dense wood down the brushy hill for about a mile. We then gained a prairie and as there was a gentle declivity, nearly all the afternoon we traveled without much further difficulty, until two hours before sunset, when we encamped; little grass. At night strengthened the guards, putting five men on each instead of four. My station was beyond the brook on which we were camped to prevent the Indians from firing into camp or among the horses, from the brush in that quarter. About an hour after I had taken my place, the moon having just risen, I observed about five Indians stealing along the wood around a small hill to the east, seemingly with the intention of getting into the brush near camp. Having a double-barreled fowling piece I fired one barrel, which brought them to a halt. The discharge of the second was a signal for their retreat the way they came. I now hastened to reload my gun, but could get no powder out of my horn. Supposing it was empty I hastened to camp to refill it, but could get none in. And now I found that a rag which I had wrapped around the stopple had slipped off and stopped up the horn. The guards were again strengthened by addition of another man to each, which took all the party for the guards of one night except two, which two had no guns. No further molestation during the night. About 2 o'clock P. M., as we were passing a difficult place between the mountains on our left covered with dense brush, and a thick wood on our right, the horses and cattle being scattered along for a mile, hollowing and a shot in the rear announced an attack. I was at this time carrying a young calf before me on the horse, with the forward band of cattle, because its mother would not remain behind. At the above signal I hastened forward to place the calf with its mother, and to acquaint Mr. Young, and then returned to the assistance of the rear. The horses being foremost were not molested, as well as the forward band of cattle. The attack was made from each side of the road. Five or six head of cattle were wounded but only one killed. This one was able to travel out into the open plain, where she was butchered, and as we needed a beef it happened just at the right time. In this attack the enemy were so well concealed that not one was seen until we had gained the open plain, when a few showed themselves on the hill, but beyond the reach of gunshot. Camped on a small brook, in the edge of the brush—had the same guards as the last night.

September 17. Moved after breakfast. A few arrows were shot at us from a thick wood on our right. Nothing was injured, however, but the riding horse of B. Williams, into the right hip of which an arrow was shot, but without much injury. Camped in an open plain, where there was no water for our animals; but a small spring about four hundred yards distant supplied our wants.

September 18. Moved about sunrise. Indians were observed running along the mountains to our right. There could be no doubt that they were intending to attack us at some difficult pass. Our braves occasionally fired on them when there was a mere possibility of doing any execution. About 12 o'clock, as we were in a strong and brushy pass between the river on the right and a mountain covered with wood on the left, firing and yelling in front announced an attack. Mr. Young, apprehensive of an attack at this pass, had gone in advance to examine the brush and ravine, and returned without seeing Indians. On making further search he found them posted on each side of the road. After the firing of four guns, the forward cattle halted, and myself, having arrived with the rear, I started forward, but orders met me in front that no others should leave the cattle. Mr. Young, feeling himself able with two or three men already with him, to rout the Indians. In the struggle Gay was wounded in the back by an arrow. Two arrows were shot into the riding horse of Mr. Young while he was snapping his gun at an Indian not more than ten yards off. To save his horse he had dismounted and struck him on the head, but he refused to go off, and received two arrows probably shot at his master. Having another brushy place to pass, about four or five of us went in advance but were not molested. Camped on the spot where Turner and party were defeated two years ago. Soon after the men on day guard said they had seen three Indians in a small grove about three hundred yards from camp. About half of the party went, surrounded the grove, some of them fired into it, and others passed through it, but could find no Indians. At night all the horses nearly famished, as they were tied up. Night set in, dark, cloudy, and threatening rain, so that the guards could hardly have seen an Indian ten paces off, until the moon arose about ten o'clock. I was on watch the first half of the night.

At a gathering of friends not long ago, says the New York Tribune, Senator Allison alluded to the courage and independence always displayed in political matters by Gen. Logan. And to illustrate these traits in the General's character Senator Allison recalled the time when the salary bill was under discussion in the Senate. "There were a number of men," said Senator Allison, "who favored the bill, but who yet hesitated to vote for it. Logan hit them a hard rap in his speech. He said that there were some Senators who probably expected to become President of the United States. He wished them to understand that voting for the salary bill would neither make nor unmake them. Their hesitation reminded him of the story of the two boys who were hunting and came across a wild boar. One of them climbed up a tree, but the other was unable to reach this haven of safety, and the boar in making a lunge at him slid between his legs. The boy caught him by both ears, and after holding on for some time, shouted out to the boy in the tree: 'John, come here.' 'What for?' queried the other. 'I want you to help me let this hog go.' 'That,' said General Logan, 'is the position members take to-day on this bill.' He was correct, but none of us told him that he had hit the nail on the head."

In his long life of eighty years P. T. Barnum has had a most versatile career. Before becoming a traveling showman he had been successively the proprietor of an oyster saloon, an editor, a bartender, a negro minstrel, a boarding-house keeper, dramatic critic, preacher, bank president, author and partner in a clock factory. He finally found his true vocation. Let other versatile Americans make a note of this.

Say what you will, the newspapers have vast influence. They can blow a man into fame or stamp him with infamy. It has some grievous sins to answer for in manufacturing orators, statesmen and great officials out of very inferior material.

When Justice Brewer was appointed to the Supreme Bench he gave some pain to fastidious Washington society on account of his straggling Kansas chin whiskers. His legal ability was not questioned, but his hirsute adornment shocked the traditions of the Court. He has bowed to this sentiment and had his Kansas chinners, together with his wild, wooly mustache, shaved off and now presents a judicial grandeur that is the admiration of all beholders. Chief Justice Fuller continues to defy public clamor with his drooping mustachois.

The danger attending the use of the drop-a-nickel-in-the-slot opera glasses has recently received practical demonstration in Berlin. A government official sat next to a lady at the theatre, who borrowed his opera glasses, and not long afterward he was taken ill with ophthalmia. He had not taken particular notice at the time, but it afterward occurred to him that the lady had appeared to be suffering with some disease of the eyes. The moral is obvious.

Fiction that follows the scientific thought of the times is well enough; but fiction that follows the social waves that clash on the shores of humanity is neither elevating nor entertaining.

Sometimes the lay of a minstrel produces an egg.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

A new four act comedy has been produced, called My Comrade. It is founded on war events.

There is every evidence that The Last Word is very likely to prove one of the great successes of the season.

Fanny Davenport's production of Sardou's Cleopatra will be the most important thing she has done in her life.

The published statement that Bill Nye has written a play for Stuart Robson, is incorrect. Mr. Robson has simply a business interest in a new comedy which is to be produced in this city next season, with Thomas Q. Seabrooke as Bill Nye.

Stuart Robson recently said that the best title he could think of for a play was A Million of Dollars. He explained that the majority of the present day theater-goers are more interested in money than anything else. Those who do not happen to have much of it themselves enjoy seeing actors act as if they were rolling in wealth.

Lawrence Barrett and his company are now engaged in rehearsing William Young's historical and romantic tragedy, Ganelon. The work will be given a magnificent production at the Broadway Theatre, January 5th, with all the original scenery designed for it by Goatcher and Young. The costumes are made by Hawthorne. Ganelon is in four acts, and one of its principal scenes will show the Saracen camp, in which an army of nearly two hundred soldiers clad in armor will appear. As a production, Ganelon is probably the most ambitious effort of Mr. Barrett's career.

Book Chat.

"I have here," said the long-haired disciple of the muse, "a poem in blank verse." "H'm! I see," remarked the editor, as he read it, "blaukety-blank verse!"

A man cannot quote Greek or declaim poetry at a hotel table to establish his claim to education or refinement. But he can do it by his quiet voice, by his unobtrusive and simple bearing.

"Ain't they rather strange names for dogs?" "Not at all. I've named them from their literary suggestiveness. I call one Edwin Drood, because his tail is cut off short, and the other Howells."

Father Time seems to be constantly casting flowers along Jean Ingelow's path in life. The great authoress at sixty years of age is described as cheerful and happy, with cheeks as round and rosy as a milk-maid's.

"American Society: How It Confounded Me," by Yon Yonson, is the latest satire on Ward McAllister's book. It is written in the Swedish dialect, and will be used to boom Jacob Litt's new comedy, Yon Yonson, which will shortly be produced.

The original "She" of Rider Haggard's story, who dwells in South Africa, has been caught and fined for committing a breach of the peace. Now if her accomplice, Mr. Haggard, can be similarly dealt with, the public will admit that justice has at last been done.

The old Essex Head Tavern, in the Strand in London, where Dr. Johnson used to resort after the "Mitre" had ceased to attract him, is now in process of demolition. It is one of the many historic London houses to fall before the march of progress. Until recently it was kept by two ladies named Fielding, who were believed to be descendants of the novelist.

Professional Chat.

A song will catch a crowd quicker than a speech, but its effects are not as lasting.

Sometimes men go to law, but generally the law is considerate, and sends for them.

Judge Turpie, the Indiana Senator, is a small man in physique, and possesses a soft, squeaky voice. He is said to use remarkably good English in his speeches, being one of the few men in Congress who stickle on purity of diction.

"General Hart is one of the brightest lawyers on this coast," said a gentleman the other day. "That is saying a great deal," replied the party to whom he was talking. "Well, I'm sure it is true, because General Hart admits it himself."

Bishop Talbot told a story in Boston the other day showing that at least one Harvard man didn't leave his wits behind him when he left college. The Bishop, it seems, arrived one day in a small mining town in his diocese—Wyoming—where he had promised to hold service. Walking up the street he noticed some green handbills flying about, took one up and read as follows: "Bishop Talbot preaches to-night at ——. Let him have a big crowd. Please leave your guns with the usher." The Bishop was not easily scared, but thought the last sentence a little odd. On inquiry, he learned that one of the young men in town, a Harvard man, by the way, who knew the Bishop, and wanted to raise a good crowd to greet him, had issued the handbills, knowing that many who would not come to hear a bishop preach, would come at a hint of a disturbance of any kind.

Col. Robert G. Ingersoll was invited to dine with a party of literary and scientific people, and he heartily accepted the invitation. The dinner hour came, but not the Colonel. He was telephoned to, and then he arrived nearly an hour late. "I left Washington this morning," was his explanation; "reached home very tired; took a rest; did some work; dressed for dinner, and forgot all about your invitation. As I was seated at the head of my own table I received your telephone message, and was dismayed at my negligence. The party at my table kindly volunteered to furnish me with acceptable excuses—that the train was late; that I had overslept myself; that I was unexpectedly detained by business; and so on. But my daughter looked at me, and said: 'Do you think, papa, that they are the sort of people that one can tell a lie to satisfactorily?' Gentlemen, I do not think so; and, therefore, I tell you the exact truth, and throw myself upon your mercy—I forgot all about this dinner." For his daughter's sake he was excused.

NOTES.

The latest prank of Harvard students is to steal all the thermometers in Boston, and the scientific inhabitants of the hub do not know whether it is summer or winter.

M. Gorex, a learned physician of Burgos, recently ascertained the fact that the figure on the crucifix in the cathedral at that place is a real human body, in a perfect state of preservation. It is said to have been in its present position since the beginning of the eleventh century.

Doctrinal sermons, once almost the rule, are now the exception. Discourses attacking the creeds of other people, once a staple in the pulpit, are likewise rare in these days. Many of the Old Testament themes upon which the divines of fifty and a hundred years ago delighted to drone through an hour or two are now seldom touched upon.

There is an element of poetic justice in politics after all. The State Library has been an object for the action of ignorant party manipulators, and it is now proposed to set the machinery of party at work again. It is true that the people who deal with this matter should leave that fitness alone; should govern the management of such institutions.

The Chicago News remarks, humorously, that until the recent application of electricity to that purpose, welding has been done with hammers, tongs, and various iron implements. Not all welding has been accomplished in this way, however. The justices of the peace and the clergy have done some of the best welding ever made. And the hammers and hard things have only been brought into play in undoing it.

One who gives presents beyond his means is a hypocrite. If, by reason of vain glory, you give more costly presents than you can afford, you are a mere pretender—a sham. In all such giving there is not grace but shame. It is not in accord with the spirit of the season and good will to do those things which so many attempt. It is just as mean and hypocritical for the one who can afford to gladden hearts, to refuse or neglect to make presents in accordance with his means.

Whenever we observe a person trying to be exceedingly popular, the result is generally very great unpopularity of that individual. There are some men who seek the slightest pretext to create a sensation or to be foisted into notoriety through some chance. When such measures succeed for the time, the thoughtless and the vicious who desire to court favor also, are loudest in their adulation of the demagogue. Of such material does consist the majority of the sensational successes.

A man's stomach has much to do with the affections of the heart. The man who has a good appetite and digestion, and gratifies that appetite, will always be found in a good humor. His heart is large open and active. From such a man you can always find affection in its truest sense. A lean and hungry man is a rascal. Caesar did not like lean and hungry men, and his final experience disclosed the fact that he was right. Woman should learn that the quickest way to a man's heart is through his stomach, by the medium of a good dinner.

"Bab" is severe on her sisters; this is what she says of them: I often wonder how it is men marry women who they know use a lot of rouge, or worse still, paint, and whom they never have seen in the morning. Woman is essentially a lazy animal. When she is industrious it is for her a misfortune, not a virtue. Consequently, when she comes home after a theatre and a supper, nine times out of ten she tumbles into bed without a thought of what she has on her face, and nine times out of ten she doesn't even take her hair down—that is, if it is her own hair. And the consequence is, she is anything but beautiful to look upon in the morning by the bright light, and her temper is pretty much in consonance with her looks. She either finds good in nothing, or else she is in a pitiful stage, when the person on whom she lavishes all her confidence is herself. Now, if a woman ever looks pretty in her life, she ought to when she is in bed, for there is always the probability of fire. The nightgown of to-day is a poem, and the woman inside of it ought to be ideal; but unfortunately she forgets about the fire; she only knows she wants to go to bed, and she doesn't care whether she smears the pillow-slip with rouge and blue pencils and eyelash sticks. Oh, yes, she uses a blue pencil; not to mark herself out of creation, but to make a dark line just inside her lower eyelid. She is quite willing to risk ruining her eyes or anything else, for that matter, if she can only appear what she considers beautiful. Silly being! Don't let her get herself to a nunnery, but take her, instead, to a face-washing establishment. A clean face is a great incentive to a clean mind, and the woman of to-day can be improved by cleanliness in any manner.

The Record-Union will, commencing January 1st, publish the decisions of the Supreme Court in full. It will be a feature of the paper interesting particularly to the bar, and of general interest to the people.

It is difficult to understand what process of reason is invoked by young men to get howling drunk on Christmas or New Year's day. Yet we find it as a fact that striplings in their teens congregate in gangs, and proceed deliberately to make monumental asses of themselves by getting drunk and becoming general nuisances.

Hon. S. T. Leet died at Oakland, on the 20th inst. Mr. Leet, in early days, filled a prominent place in the political history of the State, and at one time represented Placer county in the State Senate. His brother was one of the contributors to the fund for the preliminary survey of the Pacific Railroad by the late Theodore D. Judah.

Some inspired idiot has invented a screeching machine, which in the hands, or rather mouth, of the small boy, makes life a burden to the ordinary mortal. This infernal machine is a cross between a caliope and a tom cat serenade. It is said a certain shoe dealer introduced this abomination. Well, he needs a little application of shoe leather in a locality where it will do the most good.

Holiday season is one of joy to most of us; there are, however, very many who are unhappy through worry and anxiety at this particular time—the newly elected officer who has to stand off the army of place hunters, and the innumerable who want positions. Thank heaven, it will soon be over, and time will cool the tempers of those who will feel that the Republic is ungrateful.

One horrible result of the hunting seasons, either deer, duck, or dove, is the opportunity that is allowed the two daily papers of this city to indulge in alleged wit and humor at the expense of hunters. The space that is devoted to strained efforts at fun by some of those item-hunters, might be well put to better and more profitable use. It is positively distressing to wade through the stuff which one sometimes feels himself doing in the hope of getting something novel or entertaining. The worst of it all is, that the stupid stuff is annually repeated without variation as to detail.

As a republic America is more dependent upon patriotic schools for her youth than Germany, or any monarchy. The public schools of America are the very life-blood of the nation. They are the fountain-head of the patriotism that is to hand down this "government of the people, by the people, and for the people," to successive generations. In a magnified sense, therefore, these words of Emperor William apply with special force to the school problem in this country: "Our schools must educate our growing generation above all to unswerving loyalty to their government, permitting neither descent nor religion to interfere with it."

Laughing is sanitary. There is not the remotest corner of the minute blood-vessels of the human body that does not feel some wavelet from the convulsions occasioned by hearty laughter, says an authority. The life principle, the central man, is shaken to the innermost depths, sending new tides of life and strength to the surface, thus materially tending to insure health. The blood moves more rapidly, and conveys a different impression to all the organs as it visits them on that particular journey, when the person is laughing, from what it does at other times. Hence, every good, hearty laugh lengthens life, and conveys new and distinct stimulus to the vital forces.

Arthur McEven wrote a nice little mountain romance for last Sunday's Examiner. But he seems to be totally ignorant of the dimensions of a gunny sack, else his hero required very little grub for a week's subsistence. Here is an inventory of the contents of the sack that the old miner carried on his back: "Big Smith smiled and presently leaned forward and opening his gunny-sack gazed with satisfaction at the store of beans, bacon, coffee, sugar and flour within." But, as if in defiance of all probabilities of the capacities of an ordinary gunny, Arthur still further stretches the size of the one carried by Big Smith, and forces an additional space into it as follows: "He smiled a broader smile as he drew forth from the sack a small demijohn." But Smith must have been a monster for the story makes him "tote" that gunnysack of provisions up the steep of the Sierras for a distance of four miles under a tropical sun, with only one rest to his credit. Had a cart and donkey been improvised for the occasion and purpose, the storyette could have been swallowed. A little reflection forbids the idea of a week's grub of beans, bacon, coffee, sugar and flour, and necessary whiskey for the same time, could all be stored within the dimensions of a common gunnysack, such a one as ordinary folks have been accustomed to see. However, Arthur has literary privileges that are denied to other mortals, so we will believe the entire tale as he tells it.

There is a boom, and a healthy one, in Sacramento journalism. On January 1st the Record-Union will put on a new dress, will enlarge, and be printed by one of the latest improved perfecting presses. This improvement is not only of congratulation to our morning contemporary, but to the people. The Leader has removed to new quarters, in the post-office building, and on Tuesday evening kept open house, and was serenaded. The Daily Evening News appeared on Monday. The new candidate for public favor in the field of journalism presents a healthy array of advertisements, and evidently means business. Its news, general and local, is well culled, and it is apparent that experienced hands control the helm.

At the postoffice the other day a gentleman was heard to say that it was the only postoffice of its size he had ever seen that did not have a clock in full view for the benefit of the public. And he was correct in his criticism; a public clock is needed so that people may know the time in which they have to mail their letters, when the mails arrive and depart, how long they have to wait for the office to open or close etc. Every one has not a watch, and a clock would be a convenience and an accommodation. Doubtless a requisition on the part of our energetic and popular Postmaster would result in procuring the time-piece. It would also be a public convenience were a printed card put up in the postoffice announcing the arrival and departure of the mails; the hours of opening and closing the office and other facts that are frequently asked by strangers and which the majority of the oldest citizens are unable to give.

From the last census bulletin issued by Superintendent of Census, we find the increase in population during the past decade to be 39.7 per cent. for California. This increase, while general all over the State, is more pronounced in the cities and in the southern part. The growth of Washington has been phenomenal. As a matter of fact a large percentage of the population of Washington, Oregon, Idaho and Montana came from California. A visit to either of these States will disclose the fact of many of the inhabitants being old Californians. Nevada shows a diminution of population of 16,505, or 26.5 per cent., leaving it the smallest of States. Like California, many of its people went to Washington, Idaho and Montana. Washington's increase has been five fold during the last five years. Oregon gained about 80 per cent. According to the report the total population of the United States is 62,622,250. New York ranks first with a population of 5,997,853; Pennsylvania comes next with 5,258,014; California has 1,208,130; Nevada, 45,761, only a little more than the population of Sacramento county. The Southern States show only a small percentage of increase.

Sometimes it happens that the thoughtless act of an animal tends to the beautification of a great city. A few days ago a blind horse was hitched to an awning post; the sightless steed pulled back, and retired with the entire awning. We have witnessed the admiration Major McLaughlin entertains for horses that perform heroic deeds, in that we were on the same staff of illustrious Majors with him at the famous battle of Tripe Hill, near Santa Cruz. The charger upon which the compliments of the Major were then bestowed, was reared and educated for war—an animal akin to the one Gen. Sheridan rode; one of these horses that will carry an officer towards where there is a fight going on, and not to the rear. However, let the Santa Cruz horse rest upon his laurels and his oats. The blind horse now in question is distinguished in civil life, and we understand the Major wants the city to buy him that he may be hitched to other old awnings and pull them down. If this sightless steed cannot be purchased for use by the city, we will cordially join with the suggestion of Major McLaughlin that he be made an honorary member of the Improvement Association.

Death of E. M. Martin.

Ed. M. Martin died on Christmas eve, after a painful and lingering illness. Mr. Martin was forty-five years of age, and a member of the bar ever since 1867. He was prominent in the order of Odd Fellows, and held a number of public trusts. As a member of the bar he was an indefatigable worker, and none understood the land titles of the city better than he. The members of the bar met yesterday morning, presided over by Judges Armstrong and Van Fleet in bank. Hon. Grove L. Johnson notified the meeting of the demise of Ed. M. Martin, and made some extended, pertinent and feeling remarks on the life career of the deceased brother lawyer. The Court appointed the following committee to draft resolutions in respect to the memory of the deceased attorney: Grove L. Johnson, S. S. Holl, Geo. A. Blanchard, W. A. Anderson, and Rob't T. Devlin. The funeral of E. M. Martin took place yesterday at 2 o'clock under the auspices of the Odd Fellows.

Early Reference to a Pacific Railroad.

The following was published in the Placer Times, of Sacramento, on December 1, 1849.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.—Mr. Plumb has just arrived in this city, having crossed the continent with the view of satisfying himself more fully, by personal observation, of the importance and feasibility of the construction of the "Atlantic and Pacific Railroad," which, during the last thirteen years, he has been endeavoring to promote. We are gratified to learn, as the result of his examination, that Mr. Plumb is now only more fully convinced than ever that the best interests of the nation require that not a moment more be lost in adopting the necessary measures for the speedy accomplishment of the noble project in question.

Modern Ghost Stories.

In the fiction of to-day there is nothing more curious in its relation to the attitude of present thought and opinion than the ghost story. Novels of real life easily reflect their surroundings without loss of their power; the more practical and materialistic side of life finds appropriate expression in realism, while the imaginative is represented in idealism. Novels which have a basis in the natural are accepted and understood; but the stories which deal with the supernatural are obliged to encounter so much skepticism that it is no wonder that the tellers of ghost stories are often driven to their wits' ends to invent methods for holding the attention of the public, and for calling forth the emotions of wonder, horror, and surprise which are demanded from a regulation story of the kind. The only race in this country which seems to have a genuine belief in ghosts is the American Indian. At the present time the superstition of the coming of the ghosts is being revived, with prospects of serious consequences; for the Indian, under the influence of delusion of the kind, is ready to fall upon agencies and commit the wildest acts. It will be remembered that not long ago the Crows believed that the results of a certain medicine, taken with incantations, would render them impervious to the bullets of the United States troops, and under this delusion had the Crow Agency practically in their possession until the United States put an end to their belief. The Indian ghost story still retains its power and interest; but the tale of civilization is becoming more and more unsatisfying. Among the ghost stories written for the holidays, which are supposed to be read before the evening fire in the coziness of a bright room on a winter's night, the majority take their lead from the psychological investigations and research of modern days. Mediums, mesmerists, and unusual happenings are brought into the tales; the metaphysical conditions of a mind are worked upon. The refinements of psychological suggestion are the chief material, and a "novelty of moral shocks" is aimed at. The ghost itself is subordinate to the effect produced upon the mind by its supposed appearance. Usually it is the spirit of a person who has been wronged during life-time by the unhappy character haunted, and who becomes a very unpleasant avenger. The three great masters in this country of the mysterious and weird, Poe, Hawthorne, and Hoffman, had the advantage of working with comparatively new material, and of writing before the age of scientific inventions. The writers of the present are dealing with the unsubstantial as best they can, and perhaps are not to be blamed for failing to produce belief in their ghosts. Yet, there are superstitions in modern times which might be utilized, and it is said that the most material of all modern inventions, the railroad, has gathered about it a strange number of legends. These would produce ghost stories without the ghost, a truly modern discovery.—Boston Journal.

COURT NOTES.

Judge Van Fleet looks bright and happy on his return from his recent visit to the Atlantic States. He is ready for business.

On Monday the election contest between W. W. Rhoads and W. B. Hamilton over the County Clerkship, will commence before Judge Van Fleet's Department.

The old libel case of Hobson v. McClatchy bobbed up on the calendar yesterday, but the attorneys on both sides seemed quite anxious to down the ghost, and the case was "passed."

Judge Catlin, the new incumbent, will try the civil calendar in Judge Van Fleet's Department, preferring not to commence his administration upon the criminal calendar. Judge Van Fleet has exchanged benches at the request of Judge Catlin.

The law calendar of Department One, Judge Armstrong presiding, will be called this morning at 10 o'clock, having been continued from yesterday, in order to give the members of this bar an opportunity to attend the funeral of Ed. M. Martin.

New York Judicial Honors.

But a step intervenes between the sublime and the ridiculous, and for the past few days New York has been much more interested in the elevation of ex-Alderman "Paddy" Diver, known for twenty years past as keeper of a notorious gin mill on Park Row, to the bench of the judiciary. It is a "fat take" for Paddy, who has been nominated for a ten years term at $8,000 a year, and who will now have a chance to get even with all bummers and others who get drunk on any whisky but his own. The appointment is simply an abominable one, and justifies the worst that has been said about Mayor Grant and his factional associations. Of course, it is known to be the result of a bargain in advance of the late election, but this excuse seems to be but an additional insult to the intelligent and honest citizens of this ilk, since the powers claimed and exercised by the average Police Justice of New York are as arbitrary as those which distinguish the Magistracy of Russia. Men like Diver and Duffy (and the latter is usually "full" when on the bench), pride themselves on the number of cases they can dispose of in an hour, and it is a small matter if in the course of sixty minutes they override the constitutional rights of the individual a dozen times.—N. Y. Letter.

An Interesting and Instructive Book.

The passenger department of the Southern Pacific Company has issued a magnificent little book, which is called West by South, Half South. People traveling are very anxious to secure all the information possible, and like to have a glimpse of the attractive scenery en route. This little book is replete with instructions, statistics, engravings and general information valuable alike to the curiosity seeker, as well as the searcher after facts and dates. To lighten the gloom of cold facts, there are many little sketches characteristic of the different localities traversed by the railroads, a number of scenes in Lower California, Mexico and New Mexico, and gives which are interesting and new. A brief outline of all the places of interest and resort on this coast is presented, including a special sketch of Yosemite valley. The Lick Observatory comes in for extended notice.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

James T. Powers in A Straight Tip, played on Wednesday and Thursday nights to a fair business. It seemed to us that Mr. Powers did his work slightly in this city. There was not that snap and vim which characterized the play at the California Theatre. P. F. Daly fairly divides the honors with the star, although we thought we could detect a little indifference in the manner he portrayed "Jack Poole." Those who witnessed A Straight Tip at the Bay City noticed the difference in the star's work.

Ernani has been selected by Emma Abbott as the opera for to-night. There is not as much melodious music in this opera as in a number of others in Miss Abbott's repertoire. We would much prefer to have witnessed Verdi's creation, The Masked Ball, wherein Miss Abbott assumes the role of Oscar, a page. In each act she appears in different costume, each more brilliant than those preceding. The last is the climax, where her slippers are ablaze with diamonds. Ernani is an opera that will probably please the musical critics, but for popularity, Anne Boleyn, or The Masked Ball, have the call. The Abbott company is strong, and includes such artists as Lizzie Annandale, Myra Mirella, Michilena, Wm. Broderick, Richard Karl, and others. In Ernani Miss Abbott is dazzling with her rich costumes and diamonds.

Christmas Cheer.

As an evidence of the Christmas cheer existing in the city of Sacramento, Wells, Fargo & Co. received from the popular house of Weinstock, Lubin & Co., on Tuesday last, 1,129 packages for transmission by express, to all parts of the United States, and more than double that number was sent through the United States Mail on the same day.

Old-Time Household Rules.

Read these directions for the right ordering of a household, written in 1690, by no less a personage than Lord Algernon Percy, Earl of Northumberland:

"Let the loaves of trencher bread be larger than the loaves of household bread, and let the clippings of all bread serve for my hounds.

"Let there be no herbs bought, seeing that the cooks have enow herbs growing in my own gardens. Suckory, sowthistle and dent-de-lyon, herb and root, are to be boiled with fresh meat. With beans boil onions; it will make them less noyful.

"Bake my bread in mine own oven, making it of meal as it cometh from the millne, and brew my beer in my own brew-houses; and make my mustard within my walls, and see that one be provided to be groom of the scullery that can make it.

"Give twenty shillings—not more nor less—to the cooks on Easter Sunday.

"Bring all keys of all offices up to my counting-house every day when the latter dinner is done; let them be fetched again at 3 to serve out the drinkings (the beer and so on, answering to our tea and coffee), and let them be brought up again and remain up all night until the morning.

"Buy white herring, if they be at 10 shillings the barrel. Open white herrings by the back; pick out the bones and the roe, and see that there be mustard. Give me for my breakfast," said the noble lord, "and give my lady at our own board in Lent, a loaf of bread in trenchers, two manchets, a quart of beer and wine, two pieces of salt fish, six baked herrings, four white ditto, or else a dish of sprats."—Fashion and Fancy.

Disappointing.

He was desperately in earnest, and she was an attentive listener. All sorts of subjects he had tried in the hope of finding something she liked and could talk about. She was a puzzling sort of a girl. Her low, broad forehead and large brown eyes spoke of intellectuality; she was dressed in excellent taste; a modest silver gray gown not cut too low, and the absence of jewelry confirmed the promise of her face. And yet he had tried her on books, on the opera, on the culture of orchids—their hostess was famous for her orchids—and her responses had shown neither enthusiasm nor knowledge. Above the corner of the music-room in which they were sitting hung a small Corot—a little bit of meadow with big trees sheltering a woodman's hut, and a dense forest in the background. He called her attention to the soft twilight effects which the great painter had reproduced, and from this drifted into a talk about some pictures he had seen at a New York sale the week before. To his delight the dark eyes lit up for the first time, and she followed his description of the paintings with evident interest.

"When I was in Philadelphia in October," she said presently, "I saw a picture that I would dearly like to own. It was so full of light and delicious color—a goddess in a golden car floating among rosy clouds; the loveliest woman I have ever seen. Do you know it?—it is a famous picture, I believe; I've seen engravings of it."

"I don't know," he said. "What is it called?"

"Let me see—it was sunrise, and the horses were white—" she said, and the big brown eyes seemed to be looking at something at least a thousand miles away.

"Was it 'Aurora'?" he ventured.

"Yes?" she cried. "That's the name—'Aurora Borealis'?"

That settled it. He allowed her to turn the conversation to the intellectual game of Tiddewinks without a murmur.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

A worthy old man was unmercifully beaten at regular intervals by his unloving son. This cruel treatment did not prevent the old man from lavishing caresses on his little grandson, bringing him many presents and indulging all his caprices. One day the old man was asked why he was so very good to the child of the unloving son who beat him so cruelly. "Sh!" said the old man, "I'm spoiling him, so that he'll beat his father when he grows up!"

The widow of a church beadle died in a village in the Government of Penza, Russia, having expressed the desire that her remains be put by those of her husband. When the grave of the latter was opened the coffin was not found. On investigation it was discovered that the peasants of the villages had stolen the body of the dead beadle and sunken it in a swamp. There had been a drought in that district last year, and the peasants believed that if they sunk the body of a righteous man in water rain would come. This superstition is prevalent among the common people in that region.

There is, properly speaking, nothing good to eat in England but roast beef and mutton chops and fried sole. Coming from Paris, where the whole soul was moved to ecstasy by the smelling deliciousness of seductive viands, there is something barbarously rude and unsatisfactory in the things with which he is forced to sustain life in London. The bread is for the most part as dense as the English appreciation of a jest, while the compounding of sauces is an art the Britisher cannot learn any more than he can appreciate them when they have been concocted. He who goes to England to eat is as wise as he who goes to Patagonia to study art.

The latest thing in garters—and, by the bye, garters are a question of great importance nowadays—has for a clasp a barred gate which fastens just in the center; enamelled on this is a small dog and on the other side is the funny inscription, "No trespassing allowed." Somebody has been writing articles on garters and illustrating them, and among those shown was Mrs. Langtry's. Now, between you and me, she didn't wear garters, she always wore suspenders, and consequently the illustration belongs to somebody else. The handsomest pair of garters in New York consists of two diamond hearts that fasten together with a veritable hook and eye and have on the back of one of the hearts this inscription: "Two hearts with but a single sole." The possessor of these has a belt buckle to match, which is somewhat larger, and the inscription on it is, "Let us seek for joy among the waste places."

SUMMONS.

IN THE JUSTICE'S COURT OF WASHINGTON
Township, County of Yolo, State of California.—
I. U. Gill, plaintiff, vs. Albert Wines, defendant. The People of the State of California send greeting to Albert Wines, defendant: You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the Justice's Court of Washington Township, County of Yolo, State of California, and to answer before the Justice, at his office in said township, the complaint filed therein, within five days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons, if served within the township in which this action is brought; or, if served out of said township but in said county, within ten days; or within twenty days if served elsewhere. Said action is brought to recover the sum of $49.95, viz.: for board and lodging and for goods sold and delivered at special instance and request of you, the said defendant, as will more fully appear by reference to the complaint on file herein. And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will take judgment against you for the above amount, to wit: $49.95, and costs.

Make legal service and due return hereof.
Given under my hand this 22d day of October, 1890.
CHAS. A. NEWTON,
Justice of the Peace of said Township.

J. W. HUGHES, Attorney for Plaintiff. d20-9t

Napoleon's Mystic Letter M.

It has been said of Napoleon I that he was "all star and destiny." His actions at the battle of the Pyramids, and later on, when he claimed to have received visits from "the little red spectre," leaves little room for any one to doubt his being as superstitious as the ghost-dancer of Pine Ridge and Rosebud. One of his peculiar fads was his regard for the letter M, which he considered especially ominous for good or evil. A compilation of the facts in the M case shows good reason for both he and Napoleon III considering it a red or black letter, according to circumstances.

To begin with, Marboeuf was the first to recognize military genius in the "Little Corporal." Marengo was the first battle won by Napoleon, and Melas made room for him in Italy. Mortier was his most trusted general. Moreau betrayed him, and Murat was first martyr to his cause. Marie Louise shared his highest fortunes; Moscow was the abyss of ruin into which he fell. Metternich vanquished him in the field of diplomacy. Six of his marshals, Massena, Mortier, Marmont, Macdonald, Murat and Moncey, besides 26 of his generals of divisions, had an M as the initial letter of their last names. Murat, Duke of Bassano, was his most trusted counsellor. His first battle was that at Montenotte; his last Mont St. Jean, by which name Waterloo is known in French history. He won the battles of Miliesimo, Mondovi, Mantirail and Montereau. Then came the storming of Montmartre. Milan was the first enemy's capital and Moscow the last. He lost Egypt through Menon and employed Mielliss to take Pope Pius prisoner. Mallet conspired against him, Murat was first to desert him, then Marmont. Three of his ministers had M initials, Meret, Montalivet and Mallien; his first chamberlain was Montesquien. His last halting place in France was Malmaison. He surrendered to Captain Maitland. His companions at St. Helena were Montholon and Marchand.

A LOVELY WOMAN

overheard one say of her, "By Heaven she's painted!" "Yes," retorted she indignantly, "and by heaven only!" Ruddy health mantled her cheek, yet this beautiful lady, once thin and pale, and suffering from a dry, hacking cough, night-sweats, and spitting of blood, seemed destined to fill a consumptive's grave. After spending hundreds of dollars on physicians, without benefit, she tried Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery; her improvement was soon marked, and in a few months she was plump and rosy again, a perfect picture of health and strength.

This wonderful "Golden Medical Discovery," now world-famous as a remedy for consumption, which is really lung-scurf, is not only an acknowledged remedy for that terribly fatal malady, when taken in time and given a fair trial, but also for all forms of Scrofulous, Skin and Scalp Diseases, as White Swellings, Fever-sores, Hip-joint Disease, Salt-rheum, Tetters, Eczema, Boils, Carbuncles, Erysipelas and kindred ailments. All scaly, crusty, itching, troublesome eruptions yield readily to its curative powers. It invigorates the liver, enriches the blood and promotes all the bodily functions. It is the only liver, blood and lung remedy, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee that it will do all that it is recommended to, or money paid for it will be promptly refunded.

$500 REWARD offered for an incurable case of Catarrh in the Head, by the proprietors of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy. Only 50 cents. Sold by druggists everywhere.

The Myth of Sea Salt.

There are hundreds of queer myths and traditions given to account for the fact that the sea is salt. The Arabs say that when the first pair sinned they were living in a beautiful garden on a tract of land joined to a main land by a narrow neck or isthmus. When it became known to the Holy One that his people had sinned he went to the garden for the purpose of driving them out and across the narrow neck of land into the patch of thorns and brambles on the other side. Anticipating what would be the consequence of their heinous crime, they had prepared to leave their beautiful garden, and had actually gone so far as to send the children and the goats across into the thicket. When the Holy One appeared on the scene the first pair started to run, but the woman looked back. For this the man cursed her, and for such a crime was almost immediately turned into a huge block of salt. [Compare with Genesis xix, 26.] The woman, more forgiving than her husband, stooped to pick up the shapeless mass of salt, when immediately the narrow neck of land began to crack and break. As she touched what had once been her companion she, too, was turned to salt, just as the neck of land sank and the waters rushed through! From that day to this, the Arabs say, all the waters of the ocean have rushed through that narrow channel, at least once a year, constantly wearing away the salt of what was once our first parents, yet the bulk of the two salty objects is not diminished in the least.

The Pythagoreans believed that the sea was made salty by the tears of Krono, father of Zeus. The Hebrew explanation is somewhat similar, though more poetic. They believed that the saltiness was caused by the tears of fallen angels.

A husband who had incurred the anger of his wife, a terrible virago, seeks refuge under the bed. "Come out of that, you brigand, you rascal, you assassin!" screamed his gentle companion. "No, madame," he replied, calmly, "I won't come out. I am going to show you that I shall do as I please in my own house!"

The ancient and ghostly ceremony of the religious brotherhood known as "Of the Souls in Purgatory," in the Republic of Marino, Italy, was performed for the last time last month. The brothers dressed in black, with masks and torches, carry a skeleton stretched on a white sheet on a bier about the town, winding up with a sort of Danse Macabre. The bishops and the civil authorities, it is said, with the sanction of the Pope, have ordered that the dance shall never be held again.

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
A. J. JOHNSTON, Managing Editor.

Now that the holiday season has passed it is well that serious consideration be given to important matters of business, and the people of this city should regard carefully the matter of the municipal election that will transpire in March. We have no candidate to offer for Trustee. We do, however, desire that a man will be selected who will be entirely independent and who will be thoroughly representative of this people. The office of Trustee under our charter combines legislative and executive functions, and in some degree judicial. In the selection of the member who will act ex-officio as Superintendent of the Water Works, it does not necessarily imply that his duties are merely to see the wheels of the engine revolve, and that the machinery is lubricated, but in addition to the superintendence of the works, he should be one capable of transacting properly the city's business in the meetings of the governing Board. Of late years it must be conceded that the Board has been weak, and we have much regretted that its Monday meetings have been characterized by a lack of dignity. There has been much of scandal charged; perhaps unjustly with regard to the granting of franchises, the appointment of subordinate officers, and the conduct of the Water Works. Men in public life are the subjects of criticism; such criticism, however, should be just and in this matter we feel justified in writing these lines. We do not believe the people of the city are satisfied with the municipal management, and that there is a feeling that we would be more prosperous if there could be a change. We favor the selection of men who will devote their entire time to the management of the business of the city. That is required of the other officers, and in the cases of the members of the Board of Trustees, the salaries the people pay justify that they should devote their entire time and consideration to the management of our business. A municipal government should be nearer to business, and is nearer to the people than those of larger territories. The interests are more mutual and more important. The burden of its maintenance rests directly upon the people. In our fiscal affairs, for many years, there has been a want of a proper understanding of the true interests of the taxpayers—this, with regard to the governmental matters, and particularly the bonded indebtedness. It is now time, since reforms are suggested, that we commence by selecting a different class of men for our local legislature. When we consider that there are millions of dollars of the people's money and property directly under the control of the Board of Trustees, it certainly should be an admonition to the people to look well to their choice in such cases. It is one of the strange features in politics that in the selection of officers of this character, very little, if any consideration is given to the question of competency—availability generally prompts parties in action.

Through the inexcusable folly of past party management, the candidates of the dominant party for important city offices have been repeatedly defeated. Men have been nominated in Convention who were conceded to be of exceptional ability, but were defeated before the people simply because of the ill-advised and arbitrary action of the managers. It must be recollected that the advantage that is seemingly gained through a resort to the methods of petty politics is but transitory; a very potential jury—the people—silently, but effectually passes upon the action and places upon it the seal of condemnation. It would seem, that regarding the action of the people in the past and the repeated defeats that have followed, members of governing bodies of political parties should have forecast enough to take into consideration the feelings of the masses. Particularly what satisfaction there is in nominating candidates to be knocked down, we never have been able to understand, nor have we respect for the judgment of the local statesmen who pursue that policy. There is no reason, if the Republican organization will make a fair and just apportionment, and will pursue the policy indicated by the modern legislation of this and other States—permit the people in small territory divisions to select their representatives in conventions, that it will meet with success. But if the errors of the past will be repeated, the result will be that the Republican party will suffer another humiliating defeat. We believe, however, satisfaction would be given if an understanding could be had that would result in the selection of a large convention, though from a lesser number of precincts than are called for by the State law. The attitude of this paper is pronouncedly Republican; its editors have been more or less connected with the politics of this city and county for many years, and through that connection have had much opportunity to observe from the inner side, the management of the political affairs of the party to which they adhere. Two years ago they drafted a series of resolutions that were presented to and passed by the Republican County Convention. The resolutions in substance were a dictation from the Convention to the committee it created that thenceforth the apportionment should be to the precincts throughout the county, as designated by law, and that the membership of the convention should be large. We believe, in fact, it is manifest, that the failure of the committee to obey the mandate of the Convention, cost the party dearly at the last State and county election. It is a fact, that the campaign was unusually expensive, and that men against whom nothing was urged personally, were beaten because of the prejudice the people had against what they considered arbitrary action by the committee. We most sincerely hope, as we have here indicated, that the Republican City Central Committee will act with discretion and judgment, and that there will be no opportunity for adverse criticism. Let there be the fullest opportunity for expression of the will of the party in the Convention. If that course will be pursued we are confident a candidate will be selected for Trustee who will be elected and who will have the ability to successfully perform its delicate and important duties of the office.

A writer in Arena asks the question, "Would we live our lives over again?" If permitted to invoke our own experience, there could be little inducement to encounter the trials and misfortunes of the past. Indeed, it seems to be part and parcel of the human lot to have the shadows and misfortunes overcome the pleasurable features of our existence. When we lift the curtain of the past and view the periods of illness and suffering, there certainly would be no desire to undergo repetition thereof. We remember of the months of pain, while the flickering taper of life was ready at any moment to go out and leave us to fathom the unknown mystery that hangs over human existence. Were we given our life over again this epoch alone would bring forth a negative answer. Again we call to mind the gnawing of hunger and the thirst for days upon the desert, which no consideration could induce us to undergo again. Another event in our life, wherein we were in the immediate presence of death, lying covered with debris, with a broken leg and shattered arm, amid the agonizing cries of death all around us, at a time when many were killed and hundreds wounded. No, no, we would not ask to live that time over again. There are none who have not had their bitter experience, which no power could induce them to undergo again. While we might be glad to live over again some of the periods of life, the dark sides never fail to overcome that desire. We may forget the painful events, and nature, in many instances, causes this oblivion, but only in cases where nature itself has the controlling power. Sometimes our indiscretions cause us much pain, but these we forget and, often repeat the dose. Some people's lives have been without the thorns—Fate has not imposed her usual exactness upon them; of course such might wish to travel the beaten way of life again, but the great masses, when they revolve the past over again, could not hazard the experiment. If we could pick out certain parts, eliminate the darkest hours, then we might answer the question affirmatively. The Arena's writer indulges in these sentiments:

Life, in its actuality, will not bear investigation; has not only no enticement, but is repellant. It is deprived of hope, worse than nothing—which at least is rest, while life is unending restlessness. We all know Hesiod's fable of Pandora, and how it emblems and encompasses the truth. If we retrospect, we perceive pellucidly what dismal tricks she has played us, and what damnable trials she has exposed us to. We feel that we could not brook a repetition of the tragic farce, ycleped Life, without her; and yet we resent her remorseless impositions.

Each human being has his own life, and it is, to him or her, good, bad or indifferent. Some have gout, others a scolding wife, others afflicted in untold ways. These cannot find it in their compositions to wish to live life over again, unless they are permitted to omit the unpleasant portions.

Very few persons confide to the public their private opinion of Life; knowing that they come here, and go hence without being consulted, and without their consent, they feel that they are in for it anyhow, and keep tongue behind teeth. They try to make the best of the implacable, uncontrollable issue; for they're conscious that condemnation and protest are nugatory, dead waste. Americans in general have borrowed the stoicism of the red Indians, the antichthon of the soil; they are inclined, David-Crockett-wise, to grin and bear it. Ask almost any of them, "Would you live your life over?" and they would answer, "I pass," even when holding a full hand. We can't help living once; it isn't our fault that we do; should we live a second time, it would be our fault, a great crime against ourselves; then we'd know all we have to encounter. Men are courageous, very; but courage is not always insuperable. Living life over again is beyond the limit. There's a shuddering difference between doing what we must, and doing what we elect. "The by-ways of Horror," says Firdusi, "lead to the open road of Necessity."

After Stanley had suffered the greatest privations, and lost a number of brave men in the search for Emin, when he arrived at Zanzibar, the obstinate fellow got drunk and fell off a porch, nearly killing himself. Now, it seems that the scientific "bug fancier" has shown his ingratitude to all who helped rescue him from the wilds of the Dark Continent. This is what the N. Y. Tribune says of him.

Emin has rewarded the Germans for their patronage by insubordination. Baron Wissman has found it necessary to order him to retreat from the interior of Africa in consequence of disobedience of instructions. If English advices are to be credited, it is doubtful if he can be recalled by his employers. It is reported from East Africa that he is bent upon marching to Wadelai without reference to the plans of the Imperial Government or the treaty engagements made with England. These inferences may have been hastily drawn; but the situation, even if he can be induced to return to the coast, is somewhat grotesque. Emin for a long time was an impressive and heroic figure, a second Gordon, commanding the last rampart of the great Empire conquered by Englishmen for Egypt—the sole representative of European civilization in darkest Africa. His rescue was accomplished by the most laborious and agonizing relief expedition of modern time; but as soon as he was extricated from peril and conducted in safety to the coast, he started back, and if the English reports are trustworthy, he will not halt until he reaches Wadelai. The practical moral by which chivalrous book writers will do well to profit, is to find out whether a rescue is really desired, before they undertake campaigns of adventure in the Dark Continent. The people who were with Emin in the equatorial provinces were treacherous cut-throats and licentious and drunken marauders. They did not deserve to be rescued. They were not worth the lives of the faithful Zanzibaris sacrificed in the course of Mr. Stanley's forest march. Emin alone was worthy of consideration; and he had practically ceased to be a European. It was necessary fairly to drag him away from Albert Nyanza after months of indecision, infatuated credulity and procrastination. He returned to the coast ungrateful to his rescuers, rebelling against his deliverance, and hankering after his old life in Wadelai. Snatching at the first German offer of employment, he plunged back into those barbarous lands from which he had been delivered with prodigious effort; and having once set his face in the direction of Wadelai, it now seems doubtful whether he can be brought back by his employers. If the cost in human life and suffering had not been so great, the relief of Emin would not seem the most Quixotic and ludicrous errand of mercy ever undertaken.

After the emphatic and unequivocal condemnation of the State series of school-books by the Convention of County Superintendents that recently sat in this city, there is scarcely a doubt that the approaching session of the Legislature will respect the judgment and suggestions of the Superintendents by taking intelligent legislative action in the matter, as one of the first and most important duties of the session. It is to be sincerely hoped that no caviling or carping will prompt the legislators to neglect this public duty, that in its value is almost sacred. We know of no other obligation that can possibly engage the attention of this session comparable with this—not even the apportionment of the State into congressional and legislative districts. Doubtless there will be those of the members who will be found advocating any measure that will be beneficial and advantageous to the book and publishing houses of both California and the Eastern cities, who have in past years bribed our Legislatures and filched from our treasury. Those publishing companies will, of course, have their well paid lobbies present in force during the winter. But the honest, well-meaning members will at once discern this and put the ban of their displeasure on their unholy and illegal calling, and carry out the necessity of the occasion by enacting such laws as are required to re-compile the books by the State, and then provide for furnishing them to school children free of cost.

It has been said by some one of the few defenders of the present series, that one or more of the books was compiled by a gentleman without compensation to him for his work. This is one of the very worst charges that could have been made against the book. No one can do work so well without pay as he could if liberally remunerated. The Legislature should provide for the appointment of a Compilation Commission, to be composed of experienced educators, not one of whom should be an enemy or opponent of the system of the State having her own free text books, and who should receive liberal salaries, sufficient to enable the members to devote their time to their duties without other occupation, for a reasonable period, say two years, in which to present to the schools as perfect a series as human talent and generous salaries can possibly provide. Nor should such Commission be partisan. The members should be selected with an eye singly to their moral and theoretical and practical educational fitness for the occupation. Here there is a State duty to be performed by our law-makers, and it will depend upon them whether or not our schools are to have what the law originally intended they should have, viz: their own text books; and what the people now want in addition, and that is, that the books be supplied to the scholars free of cost to the parents.

The legislator who will take hold of this matter in good faith just as soon as the two houses are organized and ready for business, and not lose sight of it till the required law is enacted, will acquire for himself a name and reputation that will be to him an imperishable monument while our public schools stand as the most perfect of all our State institutions.

ODE TO THE DEITY.

[TRANSLATED FROM THE RUSSIAN OF DERZHAZIN.]

This ode is said to have been translated into the Tartar and Chinese languages, written on silk, and suspended in the Imperial Palace at Peking. The Emperor of Japan had it translated into Japanese, embroidered in gold, and hung up in the Temple of Jeddo. It is gratifying to learn that these nations have bestowed such honors on this noble composition. We believe that no man, however powerful his intellect and sublime his imagination, unacquainted with Holy Writ, ever did or ever will compose so exalted a poem. It abounds with Scriptural allusions. The finest parts of the ode were written when the soul of the author, perhaps unconsciously, was wrapt in contemplation of passages in the Bible. One of the most exquisite verses in the poem is that in which the poet, fleeing from the nothingness of humanity, takes shelter in the gloriously consoling idea that the Divine Spirit shines in his spirit—"As shines the sunbeam in a drop of dew." Immediately after follow the words, "In Thee I live, and breathe, and dwell." Is it not manifest that the whole of this sublimely beautiful passage is borrowed from Acts xvii, 28?

- 1 O Thou Eternal One!—whose presence bright
All space doth occupy—all motion guide;
Unchanged through time's all everlasting flight,
Thou only God!—there is no God beside!
- 2 Being above all beings!—Mighty One!
Whom none can comprehend, and none explore;
Embracing all—supporting—ruling o'er:—
Being, whom we call "God."—I know no more!
- 3 In its sublime research philosophy
May measure out the ocean deep—may count
The sands or the sun's rays—but, God! for Thee
There is no weight, nor measure;—none can mount
- 4 Up to Thy mysteries!—Reason's brightest spark,
Though kindled by Thy light, in vain would try
To trace Thy counsels infinite and dark;
And thought is lost ere thought can soar so high,
E'en like vast moments in eternity!
- 5 Thou from primeval nothingness didst call,
First chaos, then existence. Lord, on Thee
Eternity had its foundation!—All Spring forth from Thee!—all light, joy, harmony!
- 6 Sole Origin!—all life, all beauty, Thine!
Thy word created all, and doth create!
Thy splendour fills all space with rays divine!
Thou art, and wert, and shall be glorious!—great!
Life-giving, life-sustaining Potentate!
- 7 Thy claims the unmeasured universe surround;—
Upheld by Thee, by Thee inspired with breath!
Thou the beginning and the end hath bound,
And beautifully mingled life and death!
- 8 As sparks mount upwards from the fiery blaze,
So suns are born, so worlds spring forth from Thee!
And as the spangles in the sunny rays
Shine round the silver morn, the pageantry
Of Heaven's bright army glitters in Thy praise!
- 9 A million torches lighted by Thy hand,
Wander, unwearied, through the blue abyss;—
They own Thy power—accomplish Thy command,—
All gay with life, all eloquent with bliss!
- 10 What shall we call them?—Piles of celestial light?—
A glorious company of golden streams?—
Lamps of celestial ether burning bright?—
Suns lightening systems with their joyous beams?
But Thou to these are as the moon to night!
- 11 Yes! as a drop of water in the sea,
All this magnificence in Thee is lost!
What are ten thousand worlds compared with Thee?
And what am I, then?—Heaven's unnumbered host,
- 12 Though multiplied by myriads, and arrayed
In all the glory of sublimest thought,
Is but an atom in the balance weighed Against Thy greatness!—is a cipher brought Against infinity! What am I, then? Nought—
- 13 Nought!—But the effulgence of Thy light divine,
Pervading worlds, hath reached my bosom too!
Yes, in my spirit doth Thy Spirit shine,
As shines the sunbeam in a drop of dew!
- 14 Nought!—but I live, and on hope's pinions fly
Eager towards Thy presence;—for in Thee
I live and breathe, and dwell;—I lift mine eye
E'en to the throne of Thy divinity.
I am, O God, and surely Thou must be!
- 15 Thou art!—directing, guiding all—Thou art!—
Direct my understanding, then, to Thee;—
Control my spirit, guide my wandering heart.
Though but an atom 'midst immensity,
- 16 Still, I am something fashioned by Thy hand:
I hold a middle rank 'twixt heaven and earth,—
On the last verge of mortal being stand.—
Close to the realms where angels have their birth;
Just on the boundaries of the spirit-land!
- 17 The chain of being is complete in me;—
In me is matter's last gradation lost;—
And the next step is spirit—Deity!—
I can command the lightning, and am dust!—
- 18 A monarch and a slave!—a worm, a god!
Whence came I here, and how? so marvelously
Constructed and conceived!—Unknown?—This clod
Lives surely through some higher energy;
For from itself alone it could not be!
- 19 Creator!—Yes!—Thy wisdom and Thy word Created me!—Thou Source of life and good!—
Thou Spirit of my spirit, and my Lord!
Thy light, Thy love, in their bright plenitude,
- 20 Filled me with an immortal soul, to spring
O'er the abyss of Death; and bade it wear
The garments of eternal day, and wing
Its heavenly flight beyond this little sphere,
E'en to its source—to Thee!—its Author there!

- 21 O thoughts ineffable!—O visions blest!—
Though worthless our conceptions all of Thee,
Yet shall Thy shadowed image fill our breast,
And waft its homage to Thy Deity!
- 22 God!—thus alone my lowly thoughts can soar,— Thus seek Thy presence—Being wise and good!—
'Midst Thy vast works, admire, obey, adore!—
And when the tongue is eloquent no more,
The soul shall speak in tears of gratitude.

A Gambler Who Was a Gentleman.

"I am a believer," said the Colonel, tilting his chair and resting his perfectly polished boots on one of its rungs, "in man's natural goodness. I had the pleasure once of knowing an honest gambler. I liked him, too, for he was a gentleman. The days of this class of gamblers are past, however, and to-day they seem to be a scurvy lot.

"Moore, when I knew him, was a Mississippi river gambler. He traveled, in fact lived, on the big river steamboats. He never attempted to conceal the truth about himself. It was simply 'Gentleman, I am a gambler by occupation and a good one. If you care to have me play with you it will give me great pleasure. If you don't, it doesn't make a particle of difference.'

"I got to know Moore very well, and I soon discovered that when playing with the average man, luck being equal, he would win ninety-nine times out of a hundred. I never touched cards, but I used to like his society. He was a wonderfully entertaining talker. On summer nights the steward used to serve dinner on deck for those who preferred to have it there. After dinner we would go up to the hurricane deck, and when Moore was on board he would bring out his flute and play for us. When the moon was out, and threw a thin blue veil over the water, or when the boat carrying the darkness swept so close to the shore that it brushed the dark willows on the bank, the rising and falling notes that came from his instrument were gentle music to the ear. I never knew him to propose a game at cards. He would play there until some one suggested a game, when he would take his instrument apart, and put it away in an indifferent manner.

"I watched him at play one night, when Satan seemed to throw every card to this calm, self-possessed man. There was a cool, matter of fact way about him which froze the ardor of every one else except a young man about twenty-five years old. This player was in ill-luck, but with flushed face and feverish eye he made his bets furiously, only to lose every time. It soon became evident that he was playing beyond his means. Moore must have noticed it, for he ceased to bet heavily against the younger man. This angered the other.

"There was a pot of $300 once, and every one had dropped out except Moore and the young man. Moore had been playing his hand like a wonderful automaton, passionless, but sure. No man except his opponent, perhaps, could doubt that he held the winning hand. Suddenly, when his rival bet $50, Moore laid down his hand, saying, 'I won't bet. I have nothing. You played that well.'

"The young man reached out feverishly for the pile of money, and then his hand lay on the table.

"That is not true," he said. "You have a good hand and you are afraid to play it against me."

"Moore shot a hot glance across the table at him and two red spots flashed into his cheeks.

"I lay down my hand," he said slowly, but with a slight tremor in his voice.

"And I say," added the other in a low tone, "that you are a gambler, and therefore a coward."

"Hush," I said, laying my hand on the young man's sleeve. "You don't know what you are saying. He is not a coward by any manner of means."

"The young man shook off my hand vehemently.

"He is a coward," he repeated, and I will answer for my words at the first landing."

"I looked at Moore. I had seen him sit on the hurricane deck, a revolver in hand, and as a waiter threw champagne bottles over the rail, raise his arm swiftly and shatter the falling glass with a bullet. There were graver stories, too, by far, about his deadly aim in duels. He sat stiff and motionless with a terrible fire in his eyes. I was amazed by his next words.

"Does the game go on?" he asked quietly.

"Not with you," said the young man, bending forward, the veins on his forehead swelling. "Not until I prove that you are afraid to bet," and with a sudden motion he turned his hand across the table and seizing Moore's hand turned the cards face upward on the table.

"I was on my feet at that instant to arrest Moore's right arm, for I felt that he would draw his revolver at the insult. But a hush fell over those around the table, and the hot-headed young man was gazing stupidly at the cards before him. Four aces lay there—an invincible hand, for straights were not played. There was a blue tinge in Moore's white lips and the young man looked bewildered. The young fellow burst into tears.

"We can't play together any more," he cried. "You threw money in my pocket because I was losing too much. I can't take it he said,' arising from his chair.

"You can," said the gambler in an even voice. 'I laid down my hand. The money is yours. Besides, he added with a little shiver, 'I held out an ace on you.'

"Every man at the table knew that Moore had lied. We all got up and left the young man sitting there before his money. I found Moore shortly afterward on deck, looking into the darkly whirling water.

"Give me your hand," I said. 'What in the world did you mean? You never cheated at cards in your life.'

"Tut, tut, he answered with a little laugh that was slightly harsh, 'he is only a boy, and I loved his mother once.'"—New York Tribune.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

Stage marriages seem to be about on a par with stage love.

A song will catch a crowd quicker than a speech, but its effects are not as lasting.

Mme. Modjeska writes of the Americans that "they seem in too much of a hurry to enjoy life." Has she ever seen a district messenger boy or a club waiter under way?

The French dramatist Sardou has declared that he desires to be burned after death. Those who have witnessed some of M. Sardou's dramas have no doubt that his wishes will actually be satisfied.

Miss Annie Louise White, a young elocutionist, whose attainments are well known in church circles, has originated a novel idea which she uses in connection with her entertainments. It is the introduction of stereopticon views, illustrative of the recitation given. The pictures are cleverly executed, and flashing out on the white canvas at the proper moment give color and life to the scene.

The biggest stage in the world will be the boast of the Academy, New York, when the alterations contemplated after the departure of the Old Homestead are completed. Neilson Hall, the big structure adjoining the famous playhouse, recently purchased by Messrs. Gilmore and Tompkins, owners of the Academy, is to be sacrificed for the increased facilities. The depth of the great stage will be one hundred and two feet, and its width two hundred and forty-six, covering more space than one-half the theaters in the country.

Denman Thompson has received a cablegram from Hue, the capital of Cochin China, that a Chinese version of his Old Homestead is about to be presented before the King there. The actor has been petitioned by dramatic authors in almost every country of the globe for permission to translate the play for presentation. A firm of managers in Chicago offered $100,000 for the right to present the piece in Chicago during the World's Fair. Denman had planned to be in Chicago himself during the progress of the Columbus Celebration and declined the offer.

All of the artillery pieces, war implements and tattered uniforms introduced in The Soudan, the English romantic drama which is now in its fifteenth week at the Boston Theater, Boston, saw service in the bloody engagements between the English regiments and the blacks during the severe Soudan campaigns in Africa. They were specially secured from the British War Equipment Bureau by Eugene Tompkins, proprietor of the Boston Theater and owner of the American rights of the play. The Soudan will succeed The Old Homestead at the Academy, New York, next season, and remain for a whole year.

The Man of Mode; or, Sir Fopling Flutter, is a comedy by Sir George Etherege. The humor of the piece is largely supplied by Sir Fopling Flutter, but he has little to do that aids in its action. The real hero is Dorimant, a man of rank and fashion, a wit and a libertine, who, after seducing two ladies of quality, falls honorably in love with a third, one Harriett Woodvill. This young woman has come to town with her mother, ostensibly to be married to one Bellair, a marriage that has been fixed up by the parents of both parties; but the young people have an understanding, and agree that they do not care for each other, and will not carry out their parents' wishes. Bellair falls in love with Emilia, a poor girl, and Harriett encourages Dorimant's suit. But as her mother, who knows of his reputation, would never have allowed his visits, she introduces him as Mr. Courtage, a sober gentleman, detesting the gallantries of the town, and under this character he wins Lady Woodvill's esteem and affection to such an extent that when his real name is revealed to her she cannot find it in her heart to break with him.

A pair of society automatons will be among the many novel features to distinguish the production of A High Roller, the new stage character to start on his rambles next season under the guidance of Mr. E. G. Gilmore, part owner of the Academy of Music in New York, and Alex. Comstock, the business manager of that house. The managers of the new spectacular comedy have applied for the exclusive patent right to apply the principle of the talking phonograph to a pair of electrical papier mache forms representing a twin of swaggering swells of swollen swelledom. The figures will strut about the stage mechanically in the full glory of an English strut, say "pawse" for pass, "glawse" for glass, and conduct themselves like a brace of howling British swells generally. A High Roller is the newest departure in the field of theatricals and will have for its comedians such clever people as Barney Fagan, Barry Maxell, Frank McNish, Frank White, Frank Livingston, Arthur Moreland and fourteen others, making in all twenty comedians, together with twenty soubrettes. There will be a novel ballet of thirty-two people, directed and instructed by Barney Fagan, whose ability as a creator of novel ideas in this direction has made him famous.

Book Chat.

On the Steps of the Library.—Grind—Hello, Billy, what book have you got? Billy Lowstand, '93—Why, I've just got a new book written about our class, called "Ninety-three," by a chap called Hugo.

Harry C. Milton, the negro student who was recently elected class-day orator by the Seniors at Phillips Exeter Academy, says there is no truth in the current reports alleging hostility towards him on the part of the white students on account of his race. He never expected that his pale comrades would fall upon his neck and kiss him, and as for the rest he is a man among them.

Of the beautiful volume entitled "Ada Rehan, a Study," by William Winter, only 100 copies are being printed. One of its five chapters—the one relating to Miss Rehan's four London seasons—has been prepared by Justin H. McCarthy, and contains several of his poems about the actress. The book is to be privately printed and is illustrated with twenty-four portraits of Miss Rehan.

The craze for getting into print on the part of women has certainly produced some curious results. Mrs. Grant was willing to publish the most delicate secrets concerning General Grant's courtship—things that are seldom mentioned even to the closest and most intimate friends, and yet she put them in print for the whole world to read, and took pay for them. In the same way, Mrs. Beecher has announced in a series of articles on "Mr. Beecher as I Have Known Him." There is something shocking in the utter indelicacy of this.

H. R. H., the hereditary Princess of Meiningen, sister of the Kaiser, is the first Prussian Princess who has ventured to drop into print since the Markgravine of Bayreuth wrote her never-to-be-forgotten memoirs. The Markgravine was a sister of Frederick the Great. The literary efforts of William II.'s sister are, it is necessary to state, of quite a different type from that of this lady, for Princess Charlotte, as she is called here, is one of the sweetest and purest of women, and a true daughter of her lamented father. The Princess combines her efforts with those of her husband in translating German classical works into the new Greek language. Schiller's "Robbers" immortalized by Fechter & Lessing's "Emelia Galotti," have just been adapted by the royal pair for the Athens stage, and the Princess is at the present time busy with the adaptation of "Romeo and Juliet." Some classic French dramas are to follow.

In the "Life" of Lord Houghton, just published, is to be found Carlyle's account of his last sight of Thackeray. "Poor Thackeray!" he says, "I saw him not ten days ago. I was riding in the dusk, heavy of heart, along by the Serpentine and Hyde Park, when some human brother from a chariot, with a young lady in it, threw me a shower of salutations. I looked up—it was Thackeray with his daughter; the last time I was to see him in this world. He had many fine qualities, no guile or malice against any mortal; a big mass of a soul, but not strong in proportion; a beautiful vein of genius lay struggling about in him. Nobody in our day wrote, I should say, with such perfection of style."

The setting sun has dropt below the sandy reach,
The laggard rooks come home, belated, for the beach;
Here in the garden-beds the flowers close their eyes,
And twilight's soft won mist across the woodland lies.
Oh, is not this most sweet of any time or hour,
After the garish day, and ere the night-clouds lower?
'Tis as though Nature's self should pause upon her way,
Gray-clad and pilgrim-like, to meditate and pray.

What Oliver Wendell Holmes describes as "book-hunger" seems with Mr. Gladstone to increase with years. Catalogues conscientiously perused and duly marked by him are quite a frequent feature in booksellers' windows. One of the most interesting examples, as it is also the latest, is now exposed with the check in the window of Mr. Menkin, in Gray's-Inn-road. Nearly forty books were ordered, subject to the discount of 10 per cent. for cash, upon which the G. O. M. always insists. The most remarkable thing that strikes one in glancing through these catalogues is the extraordinary variety of Mr. Gladstone's reading. His first book, for example, is an odd volume, "A Sketch of the Pre-Shakespearian Drama," by F. Ireton; then come three works on anthropology, one of which is Carus Sterne's "Werden und Vergehen" in the original German. As a set-off to Taylor's origin, etc., of "The Fine Arts in Great Britain and Ireland," Mr. Gladstone orders Sternberg's translation of Dr. Magin's "Bacteria." Bibliography also appears to be a favorite subject with Mr. Gladstone, for he orders Dobson's "History of the Bassandyn Bible" and the "Archiv fur Geschichte des deutschen Buchhandel." It would be highly interesting to know what Mr. G. wants with Cobbett's "Advice to Young Men and Women." The "drink question" and "epitaphs" are truly strange companions, but the ex-Premier orders two upon each topic, one being by W. Andrews. Heredity, Mormonism and Popery, not to mention two books by Priestly, are duly marked off. But it is Shakespeariana that Mr. Gladstone orders wholesale. Sixteen French and six German translations from, or criticisms on, Shakespeare form a portion of the order; so that our readers need not be at all surprised to learn that Gladstone will edit a variorum edition of the great dramatist or some such stupendous undertaking! Truly an Inexhaustible Old Man!

Professional Chat.

Dr. T. M. S. Kenney tells his story of foreign mission collection experience: "I was preaching," said he, "in a certain section of the country, and after the close of the services, a dear, good brother invited me to dinner. If I had known what I afterwards knew, I think probably I should not have gone. I had talked of a collection for the purpose of missions, and as we were driving to the brother's home, he said to me: 'Brother Kenney, did you notice that I did not give anything this morning?' 'No,' said I, 'I never notice who give and who do not.' 'Well, I didn't' continued he. 'I couldn't afford it. I'm too much in debt, but when I get rid of these troublesome demands I'll give something to the work of the Lord.' 'But,' said I again, 'don't you owe the Lord something?' 'Well, I don't know, I suppose I do. I never thought of it before in that light.' 'I am glad you see it now in a different light,' I ventured to remark encouragingly. The dear brother hastened to add, however: 'The Lord don't crowd me as the others do.'"

Some of the peculiarities of witnesses are described in an article which is going the rounds of the legal papers. Some of the mistakes and retorts of witnesses are comical. One, when asked whether her husband struck her with impunity, said: "Yes, sometimes, but usually with his fist." Another spoke of the existence of a family fuel, evidently meaning "fued." A policeman, who is credited to New York, said, in speaking of his use of a club: "I am willing to be let upon, your Honor, but not altogether. The law must be dedicated; give him justice tampered with mercy." A boy, who had perhaps heard of police trials before the Commissioners, was examined as to his knowledge of the nature of an oath, and in answer to a question as to what was done to persons who swore falsely, said: "They makes policemen out of 'em." A woman, who certainly appeared older, told the magistrate in a French Court that she was twenty-five years old. A young man who was called as the next witness acknowledged twenty-seven. "Are you related to the previous witness?" was the first question. "Yes, I am her son," was the reply. "Ah," muttered the magistrate, "your mother must have married very young." An English judge had an experience which is not frequently repeated in Courts in this country. The witness in relating a conversation would give the substance rather than the words, and the judge, Baron Martin, started to teach him the proper method of testifying. He said to the witness: "My man, tell me just what was said." "Yes, my lord. I said that I would not have the pig." "And what was his answer?" "He said he had been keeping it for me, and that he—" "No, no, he could not have used those words, he spoke in the first person." "No, my lord, I was the first person that spoke." "I mean don't bring in the third person; repeat the exact words used." "There was no third person, my lord—only him and me." "Now, my good man, he did not say that he had been keeping the pig; he said, 'I have been keeping the pig.'" "I assure you, my lord, there was no mention of your lordship at all. We are on different stories. There was no third person there; and if there had been anything said about your lordship's keeping the pig I must have heard it." The witness was allowed to finish his story in his own way.

A monument to Hernando Cortez, the conqueror of Mexico, has been erected in his native town in Spain. Cortez will always stand forth as a picturesque figure in an era of conquest.

NOTES.

The most ancient style of writing was on bricks, and it survives to this day in the handwriting on the wall we hear so much about at election times.

In fever occurring in consequence of a cold, the remedy is either a hot bath or an old-fashioned rum sweat. These are among the best means of abating the trouble.

There is more religion in a box of toys and candy for a poor child, or a fat goose and a basket of goodies for a destitute family, than in a volume of sermons or a ton of tracts.

Some philosopher has figured out that if the sun were a burning sphere of solid coal it could not last 6,000 years. The great value of this item lies in the reflection that the sun is not a burning sphere of solid coal.

There are two kinds of good women; one brings in tracts when you are sick, the other a bowl of soup. The real good woman is the one who looks after the life on earth; that is the one who brings in the bowl of soup.

The Farmers' Alliance has clearly become a mere annex to the Democratic party; and the Republican members thereof are thus released from their obligations, and should make their way back into their own party as soon as possible.

A French journal announces that the Prince of Wales owes $800,000. Perhaps the Prince holds that a private debt is a national blessing. Some one has remarked, possibly Oliver Cromwell, that princes come high, but we must have them.

No graduate of Vassar College has ever been divorced from her husband. Such is the statement of a man who married one of them, and who declares that the young ladies who have been educated at the college are the best cooks in the world.

It was an old time superstition, that hiding a lock of hair in a tree would cure the toothache, and a relic of this custom was found the other day in Porter, Me., when a man in cutting down a white oak tree came upon a lock of hair six inches under the bark.

Superstition has it that where the eagle builds its nest, lightning never strikes. There are many politicians who never find where the eagle has her nest. Still it often occurs that lightning strikes where least expected. The result of the recent election is evidence of this fact.

"No, I never carry my watch when I go out," she said artlessly. "I am so careless that it wouldn't be safe. Why, a person could steal anything right from under my nose and I wouldn't miss it." Then the young man stole a kiss right from under her nose and she didn't seem to miss it.

There are not less than 146 different religious denominations or sects in the United States, according to the latest accounts. It used to be said that it took only a Bible, an old woman and a cat to set up a new religious denomination; and perhaps some of the existing sects are not much better endowed and equipped.

Our grandfathers and great-grandfathers were frequently "three-bottle men." A common bet was a "rump and dozeu"—not a dozen of oysters, but a dozen bottles of claret or port. This rump of beef, cooked as steaks, and the dozen of wine, provided entertainment for the bettor, the bettee, and, say, two friends.

There will always be a class who do not like work; and as an invariable rule these fellows turn up as the loudest in bewailing the misfortunes of the laboring man. They are the first to urge a rupture between the workmen and their employers. Trace the history of every important conflict with this regard, and it will be found that the idle, lazy fellows are always to the fore in these disorders.

Pliny, a well known writer of about the time of Christ, mentions having seen an agate, the lines and markings of which formed a perfect picture of Apollo and the nine muses. Pliny says that little children recognize it on sight. In this wonderful natural picture, as well as in artificial drawings, Apollo was represented seated in the midst of the muses, harp in hand.

One finds fewer tobacco chewers than might have been found twenty years ago. More men are taking to the cigar, out of regard for its superior cleanliness, while the ranks of the chewers are no longer recruited from the urchins, who find the cigarette less trying on the stomach, and equally comforting to their sense of manliness. The tobacco chewer is disappearing, along with the female pipe-smoker and the snuff "dipper."

The smart thing now in engagement rings is the marquise. Rubies, sapphires and diamonds, turquoises and diamonds, are all used in these pointed rings. One large, solid turquoise, surrounded by diamonds, and costing $300, is a great favorite. Five rubies, placed straight, and set about with diamonds, are also admired. Three emeralds set about with diamonds are shown, but many people have as great a superstition against emeralds for engagement rings as against opals. A new fancy is to have a yellow diamond set in iron, which is enameled a dull blue. This makes a quaint, odd ring.

Some New Haven smokers have started a tobacco moderation society, members being limited to three cigars a day. They have to deposit daily a sum equaling what they had been accustomed to spend on tobacco, minus the value of the three cigars; and in case a member smokes more than three cigars on any day, he forfeits all the money he has deposited. Those who adhere to the agreement for one year will share equally in the fund created by the forfeitures. This is very good as far as it goes, but it would seem as though there ought to be some prize for the members who smoke less than three cigars a day.

Savage-like the Esquimaux of Northwest-ern Alaska are imitating our own redskins, and killing the golden goose that keeps the pot boiling. The deer are being exterminated. Arctic advices say that the season's catch in deer, walrus, whales and seals, has been a failure. Six natives consume a 125-pound deer at a sitting. Captain Healy, of the revenue steamer Bear, will propose that the government buy a number of reindeer from a certain migratory race of people on the Siberian coast, and carry them on the Bear to some point on the Alaskan coast where moss and feed are plentiful. These deer will then prove the nucleus of a herd for general distribution over the territory.

The goosebone, the crab-shell, the fur of squirrels, coons, and other animals, are reported to agree this year in betokening a severe winter. The readers of these animal life signs are pretty safe this time, inasmuch as the broad, scientific law of averages calls for just such a season as they predict. The goosebone-muskrat-house-crab-shell prophecies need a little success for once. They have missed the mark sadly a good many times in the last few years. Using an old Indian sign as a guide, this coming season will be fair and pleasant. The geese are flying to the north in great flocks, which, according to the legend, indicates a mild winter. When the geese are migrating to the south, it is indicative of a severe winter.

Strolling Players.

The strolling players who visit our villages and small towns are dear to the hearts of the people. The demands of these rustics are small, and they are delighted with modest returns. Tinsel, spangles, and stage scenery painted at the rate of 1d. per square yard are to them spectacular splendors, and common-places are regarded with a kind of awe if delivered in velvet cloak and buskins and in stately Ciceronian style. These rustic audiences have no touch with the great world, and if knowledge of it, past or present, shall be had by them, it must be imported. The strolling player in a sense becomes one of their benefactors, teaching them the deep records of history, and leading them through the enchanted realms of romance. Puck, Ariel, and the Fairy Mab convey them to the sweet lands which they have never seen since their childhood's days—and then only in dreams. They cheer with Henry V at Agincourt, and, with a grim satisfaction, thank the destiny which slays Richard III at Bosworth Field. What a charming witchery has been wrought for them by these magicians of the stage! What a bridging of the centuries! What a resurrection of history making events! Agincourt! King Henry V! Why, here they are, this very night, rubbing shoulders with the monarch, and within touch of the fateful fight that contributed so much to make England's greatness. Or mayhap they have a delectable glimpse of pastoral life so like that in the hamlets, dales, and woodlands of merry England. Beyond the footlights there, reclining on the grass by the huge bole of an oak (foliage and vegetation hastily improvised, but no matter) the melancholy Jaques moralizes on human life—

"All the world's a stage,
And all the men and women merely players."
They see Rosalind gleaming like a heavenly vision among the shadows of the wood, and in the sharp wit of Touchstone and the wholesome laughter of Audrey hear echoes of their own round of life, and, as they go home to dream again of "As You Like It," they begin to realize that, after all, the Forest of Arden is not so far removed from them, and that Jaques and Corin and Touchstone and Audrey are wonderfully like themselves.

Two ladies in a J-street car were discussing a third. "She means well," said the first, "but she is so provokingly absent-minded. She actually wrote my name in ink on the back of a Christmas card she sent me. Now, how can I have the face to send a scratched old thing with rubber-marks on it to some one else next year?"

Ballot Reform.

The Pennsylvania Ballot Reform Association has issued the following address to the citizens of Pennsylvania:

As soon as the Legislature convenes, a bill prepared by this association will be introduced to provide for a secret ballot by the Australian system, and for an open count. That the object of the bill may be fully understood, we present a brief statement of what is meant by ballot reform and the Australian system.

The term ballot reform includes all such changes in our present system of registration and voting, and in the laws regulating elections, as will keep illegal votes from being cast or counted, limit election expenses, prevent the improper use of money, and put an end to bribery and coercion by making them useless, if not impossible. It means whatever will make an election the free and pure expression of the will of the people.

The Australian voting system is an effectual measure of ballot reform, because it enforces a secret ballot. It was first used in Australia (under universal suffrage,) in 1856, and has now for years been employed by millions of freemen in Great Britain and her colonies, as well as in other countries. It has everywhere produced the best results, and has never been given up in any place where it has once been used. Since its adoption in Massachusetts, in 1888, it has rapidly become popular in this country, and is now in use, more or less completely, in fifteen States.

The chief features of the system as adapted to American elections are these:

1. Nominations can be legally made (as provided by simple regulations), either by party conventions or by the endorsement of a reasonable number of citizens, without regard to party. The name of every legally nominated candidate must be printed on the ballots free of cost to him or his supporters.
2. Ballots. The publication of candidates' names, and the printing and distribution of ballots, are paid for by the counties, like other election expenses. Only official ballots are used.

All candidates' names and addresses are on the same ballot, grouped by the respective offices, but marked in each case with the party, or policy represented. Thus:

Governor.	Vote for one.	Place reserved for the mark.
GEORGE W. DELAMATER, Meadville.	Rep.
JOHN D. GILL, Westmoreland County.	Pro.
ROBERT E. PATTISON, Philadelphia.	Dem.
Blank where any other name can be inserted.

3. The voting is done inside a room, a part of which is railed off. After each voter has established his right to vote, he passes the rail. An election officer then gives him a ballot, and he goes to a standing desk which is so closed in as to screen him from observation, and makes a cross mark (X) against the name of each candidate on the ballot for whom he wishes to vote. After folding his ballot so as to conceal the marks, he goes to the box and deposits the ballot.

Blind, crippled, or illiterate voters can be helped to mark their ballots by the election officers.

4. Other precautions for secrecy. Before the boxes are opened the official list of voters, or other means of identifying the parties who cast the respective ballots, must be sealed up, so that the process of counting will not violate the secrecy of the ballot, even while the present cumbersome method of numbering, required by the State Constitution, remains in force.

PRACTICAL RESULTS OF THE SYSTEM.

1. The facility for independent nominations is a useful check upon party conventions. If the people desire other candidates than those of the party organization, they can easily name their own candidates.

2. All candidates, rich or poor, with or without the support of a party organization, are on the same footing as regards the official publication of their names, and the enabling their supporters to vote without the heavy expense of printing and distributing ballots.

3. The great decrease in legitimate election expenses, removes the cloak under which large sums have often been collected, ostensibly for necessary expenses, but really to buy votes with.

4. The ballots being official, no legally nominated candidates' name can be left off the ticket. There can be no mixed or deceptive ballots by which to "trade off" or "sell out" a candidate.

5. All ballots being alike, until marked, the marking being done secretly, and the voter being prevented from showing it to any one, the ballot is secret. This secrecy is the fundamental object of the system. When it is impossible to know how a man votes, it is useless, either to buldoze, or to buy him.

The open count goes hand in hand with the secret ballot. Ballots should be counted under the eyes of the citizens, to prevent all chance of fraud after the polls are closed. A citizen has a right to see what is done with his ballot when the box is opened. The open count is in use in two-thirds of our States and Territories.

Inauguration Ball—1860.

We have in our possession a time-worn scrap-book of an old citizen, and among the curios pasted in it is an invitation card to the inaugural ball on the occasion of the installation of Governor Milton S. Latham into office. The invitation is not as elaborate as those of this day. It reads as follows:

INAUGURATION BALL—MILITARY AND CIVIC.

The pleasure of your company is respectfully solicited at a Grand Inauguration Ball, to be given at the Pavilion, Monday evening, Jan. 9th, 1860.

Invitation Committee.—Wm. Shattuck, Leland Stanford, J. W. Winans, H. H. Hartley, F. Powell, D. O. Mills, B. F. Hastings, Maj. J. W. L. Hunt, L. Sanders Jr., T. S. Fiske, H. E. Robinson, Capt. R. E. Eyre, Capt. J. Howell.

Reception Committee.—A. C. Monson, J. R. Hardenbergh, Gen. A. Redington, S. Kneeland, Capt. J. Howells, Capt. E. E. Eyre, Gen. N. G. Curtis.

Floor Committee.—A. K. Grimm, Morg. Miller, Ed. Robinson, H. T. Booram, H. A. Thompson, H. A. Chase, Lieut. C. J. Torbert, Lieut. L. Powers, E. B. Ryan.

Carriage Committee.—Lieut. J. Rothenbacher, J. P. Sharkey, Jos. Marshall, Thomas Roberts, Morg. Miller.

Of the gentlemen named on the committees it is a matter of remark how many of them are dead. Shattuck was President of the Board of Supervisors under the Consolidation Act and ex-officio Mayor of the city. Joseph W. Winans was a lawyer of prominence, and contributed much to the better class of literature. Hartley was an accomplished lawyer. B. F. Hastings was the head of the banking house of B. F. Hastings & Co. that was located in what is now the Rhoads & Townsend house. Lewis Sanders, Jr. was a lawyer well known. H. E. Robinson was a member of the first Legislature, removed to Oakland and died in the East. He left a magnificent fortune for charitable purposes in Oakland. J. R. Hardenbergh was Postmaster and Mayor here, and afterward occupied important Federal positions at San Francisco. Gen. Redington was for many years Manager and President of the California Steam Navigation Company, and was a Presidential Elector. He was a native of Maine, and an ardent admirer of ex-Vice President Hannibal Hamlin. When Mr. Hamlin spoke in this city Gen. Redington presided, and we well recollect the old General standing by the side of Mr. Hamlin during the entire time the latter spoke. Seth Kneeland was prominent here in the early days. A. K. Grimm was a well known auctioneer and business man. Morg. Miller was County and City Treasurer, and signed all of the bonds and coupons of 1859, over which we have so much contention now. Booram was reporter of the decisions of the Supreme Court. Thompson, with A. G. Kinsay, built the first wire suspension bridge at Folsom, over the American river, and was the husband of Agnes Clarkin, the sister of Hon. R. M. Clarkin, of this city. He died in Arizona. Torbert left here and located in San Francisco when the railroad offices were removed from this city, and continued in the employment of the company until his death. Powers was a merchant of prominence. Those men are dead. Of those living there will be recognized the names of several who are now of more than State note.

ELEGY MONGERS.—One of the items of expenditure which became fashionable after the restoration, was the payment of rhymesters to write funeral elegies. Quite a host of poetasters traded on this fashion, and the specimens which Mr. Maidment collected of their effusions show that the majority would have been dear at any price. Neither in veracity nor in literary quality do these Scottish elegiac writers seem to have been better than he who wrote the famous epitaph of the lady who was "bland, passionate, and deeply religious; she painted in water colors, and sent several pictures to the Dublin Exhibition; she was first cousin to Lady Jones, and of such is the kingdom of Heaven." An epitaph which is even exceeded by an obituary notice of a Miss Wallace. Of this lady it was recorded that "her conduct was beyond all praise. She engaged in ornamental working on glass, confided greatly in others, and died in squalid penury!" As for the funeral poets, a casual perusal of Mr. Maidment's collection leaves the impression that if, as he says, the poetaster was a person as necessary as the undertaker, one would rather remain unburied than be so atrociously sung.

When a girl marries a military or naval officer, she must be sure and have the wedding to correspond with the colors of the bridegroom's arm of the service. A navy wedding must, of course, be all blue and gold. If a girl marries a cavalry officer, blue and yellow, the cavalry colors, must prevail. If the bridegroom is in the artillery, blue and red is the proper caper, and if in the infantry, blue and white. The English have a pretty custom at a naval or military wedding of having the bride's cake cut with the groom's sword.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

Mrs. Annie Abbott, the "Magnetic Wonder," has been mystifying the Sacramentans with her magnetic powers. Our scientific men cannot solve the problem of her gift.

The Howard Atheneum Combination will occupy the Metropolitan Theater on Monday and Tuesday, January 5th and 6th. This company has been greatly augmented since its last appearance in this city.

The Skating Rink has re-opened, under the management of J. M. Sullivan, at the old Pavilion, Sixth and M streets. Mr. Sullivan is an active manager, and the lovers of the healthful exercise of skating can expect rare sport during the winter evenings.

Emma Abbott used Sacramento as a "one night stand" last week, and gave Ernani to a good house. We think it is about time for the Abbotts to retire from the stage and give place to some of her more favored sisters. About the only things that she has as stock in trade now are large diamonds, big legs, and a very small voice, supplemented by gorgeous attire. When a debutante, or aged actress, relies on this, the structure is weak.

During the session of the Legislature, Manager Hall will have all the great attractions in the dramatic line that visit this coast. We learn that the owner of the Metropolitan Theater has at last resolved to remove that drop curtain which has so long marred the other artistic work of that beautiful theater. It is just to say that it is not the owner's fault that it has not been thrown aside long ago, but some contract has prevented his action.

On Wednesday last that noted veteran actor, Walter M. Leman, died at San Francisco. He was one of the oldest actors on the stage, and always occupied a high place as a gentleman and an artist. He has supported all the great actors from the senior Booth down to the present day. In 1851 he made his first appearance at the old Pacific Theater, which was located on M street near Front, which was opened by Charles R. Thorne. In this theater the elder Booth, supported by his son Edwin, played The Iron Chest, and we believe Leman was in the cast. Walter Leman also was an actor in the old Sacramento Theater, which was located on Third street between I and J, in the year 1853. Among his contemporaneous actors and artists in that year were Ole Bull, Mr. Strakosch, Anna Bishop, Matilda Heron, the Robinson family, Barney Williams and wife, Mrs. Thomas, Mrs. Judah, Mrs. Sinclair (subsequently Mrs. Edwin Forrest), George Chapman, Henry Sedley, J. B. Booth, F. S. Chanfrau, Dave Anderson, Lewis Mestayer, of the old family. Later, in 1855 and 1856, he played with McKean Buchanan, Charles Pope, Sophie Edwin, A. R. Phelps and J. H. Warwick, who was in 1864 a member of the California Legislature. In 1862 Walter Leman was a regular member of the Metropolitan Theater Company, under McKean Buchanan. Chas. Pope and Mrs. Saunders were members of this company. In 1864 Mr. Leman supported Chas. Thorne, Jr. In 1865 he, in company with Chas. Thorne, Jr., George Pauncefort and Bill Barry, supported Sophie Edwin at the Metropolitan. In 1868 he was a member of Jos. Proctor's company, which held the boards of the Metropolitan. Ever since that time Mr. Leman has supported the leading artists on the stage of this coast. At the dedication of the new Metropolitan Theater, in 1884, Walter Leman delivered the opening address. A few years ago he was elected Public Administrator of San Francisco and served one term. Mr. Leman was a distinguished man and held a place in the hearts of the profession as well as of the people.

A Work of Art.

Postmaster Coleman, for several years, has been the owner of a splendid snow white horse. The animal is not only handsome, but exceedingly intelligent. We have often watched the intelligent animal while in front of Mr. Coleman's office on J street, before Mr. Coleman became Postmaster, looking in the window at his master with a wistful expression, as much as to say, "Well, is it not time for my oats?" So marked were the characteristics of this horse, that Mrs. A. C. Herrick, who is an artist of much merit, and who has a gift in animal painting, concluded to create this white horse on canvas. Accordingly on Christmas day, Mrs. Herrick presented Mr. Coleman an elegantly executed portrait of his favorite. An inspection of this picture in detail discloses the fact that it is absolutely perfect, and looks just as the original used to when peering in the window with "I want my fodder" expression. A fine horse portrait was once criticised by an old horseman. It seems that the artist had painted foam around the mouth of the animal without showing any bit in his mouth—this the critic remarked was unnatural. But Mrs. Herrick's fine painting is not subject to such criticism.

Stockmen's Liniment. For rheumatism and neuralgia, sprains and bruises its effect is magical. Both the above for sale by Kirk, Geary Co. and J. Hahn & Co.

The Senate and Assembly Chambers, under the artistic hand of Thos. O'Neill, present a fine appearance. The frescoing is something splendid. While the several State offices have been decorated as they never were before, the work on the Senate and Assembly Chambers eclipse anything in the decorative art on the Coast.

POLITICAL NOTES.

Hon. John B. Reddick, the Lieutenant Governor, has made the Capital Hotel his headquarters during the ensuing session of the Legislature.

The new Police Judge, R. O. Cravens, ascended the bench yesterday. We are promised and expect some very greatly needed reforms in the Police department. The Augean stables need cleansing very badly.

Miss Callie Vivian, of Colusa, is a candidate for Engrossing Clerk of the Senate. Miss Vivian is an accomplished young lady, both in literature and art. At the contest in the Sacramento Art Association, Miss Vivian bore away the prize. She has many active friends in her political aspirations, and it is fair to assume that she will succeed in carrying off the honors of the Engrossing Clerkship.

Clara Felton Parsons is an aspirant for the position of Assistant Journal Clerk of the Assembly. This lady is deserving of the favorable consideration of the members of the Assembly, and we trust that she may prevail upon that august body to give her the preference. She is a worthy and polished lady. By all means let Clara Felton Parsons be selected over some superannuated old male hangers-on.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of M. D. Thomson, an insolvent debtor.—M. D. Thomson, having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which it appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said M. D. Thomson is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said M. D. Thomson, debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the Court-room of said Court, on the 6th day of February, 1891, at 10 o'clock A. M., of that day, to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.

Dated 29th December, 1890.

PHILIP S. DRIVER, Attorney for Insolvent. ja3-5t

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to LOUIS C. MCADAMS, greeting: You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State of California, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 2d day of January, 1891, in which action Laura A. McAdams is plaintiff and you are defendant. That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To obtain a decree of said Court, dissolving the bonds of matrimony, now and heretofore existing between plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds of the failure of the defendant for more than one year last past to provide the plaintiff with the common necessities of life, he having the ability so to do, and upon the further ground of the conviction of defendant of felony in British Columbia, and that his discharge from the confinement in pursuance of said conviction on—day of May, 1890, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made, and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said county of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief described in her complaint.

In witness whereof, I, Wm. B. Hamilton, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand [SEAL] and affix the seal of said Court this 2d day of January, A. D. 1891.

Valley of the Moon.

There have been many explanations offered in times past as to why the name Sonoma was given to this valley by the native tribes of Indians, who, upon the advent of the white man over 100 years ago, peopled this section of the country by thousands. Of course we all know that Sonoma valley in aborigine means "Valley of the Moon," but just why that name was bestowed upon it is another question, and one, too, which we believe has never been satisfactorily answered. Recently, in talking to an aged Indian who has resided on the old Nick Carriger ranch for many years, and who was an old man when General Vallejo settled in Sonoma fifty-five years ago and must be something over 100 years of age, he stated that the reason the valley was called Sonoma was because it had "heap mucho moons." (Translated in good English, many moons.) Further inquiry developed that between the town of Sonoma and the Bella Vista vineyard, a distance of four or five miles, the moon, when it is full, can be seen by the traveler to rise seven times in succession over the mountains in the east, owing to their peculiar formation. This phenomenon has been witnessed by many old residents in the early evening at the rising of the full moon. This, no doubt, had been observed by the Indians, and hence the name "Valley of the Moon."—Sonoma Index Tribune.

The men who are known as "master of the hounds" and "grand falconer" get large salaries. The positions are all regarded as very dignified places. For instance, the Earl of Coventry is the "master of hounds," at a salary of $7,500 a year. Of course he has nothing to do with the hounds, or with their care, except to say a word now and then to the "huntsmen," or to buy a good dog if he sees one. The Duke of St. Albans is the "grand falconer," at a salary of nearly $5,000 a year. To that title is allied that of herder, and in the fiction of this curious custom and condition he is supposed to have some control over the breeding and management of the deer that are bred for the hunt. But he has about as much to do with them as a stranger who never saw Ascot, the Queen's kennels, or witnessed a run over the fields after the deer. These positions were created, and are maintained for the purpose of increasing the income of such people as may enjoy the Queen's favor, and they are piled upon one another until a Duke or Earl who has commended himself to the Queen occupies a dozen different positions, so far as drawing the salary is concerned, without rendering any service therefor.

Give Happiness to Others.

George W. Childs, proprietor of the Philadelphia Ledger, left his office Christmas eve happy in the conviction that he had made a happy Christmas for many of his fellow creatures. During the day he distributed upward of $20,000 in checks and cash, besides hundreds of books and other nice things. Of the large amount of cash which he gave away, $10,000 went to his employees in the Public Ledger building. Each individual received his present inclosed in an envelope bearing his name, and the amount in every case was regulated according to the recipient's worth. No one was overlooked, from the basement to the composing-room. Each of the office boys received $20, while some of the editors' gifts were up in the hundreds. The checks ranged in value from $100 to $500 each. Mr. Childs personally placed the gifts in their envelopes, so that no one should know how much he gave each person. Not even was the cashier, Colonel Muckle, taken into the secret. All the latter did was to furnish Mr. Childs with so much cash in $20 bills, so much in $50 notes, and so much in big crisp $100 greenbacks. Nor did his good work end here; for when he started homeward it was with a big pocketful of bank bills ready for distribution among his domestics. "My greatest happiness at Christmas," he modestly said, "comes from the fact that I am able to give happiness to others, and I thank God that He has placed it in my power to do this."

"Yes," said the young man, as he threw himself at the feet of the pretty school-teacher, "I love you, and would go to the world's end for you." "You would not go to the end of the world for me, James. The world, or the earth, as it is called, is round, like a ball, slightly flattened at the poles. One of the first lessons in the elementary geography is devoted to the shape of the globe. You must have studied it when you were a boy." "Of course I did, but—" "And it is no longer a theory. Circumnavigators have established the fact." "I know, but what I meant was that I would do anything to please you. Ah! Minerva, if you knew the aching void—" "There is no such thing as a void, James. Nature abhors a vacuum; but admitting that there could be such a thing, how could the void you speak of be a void, if there was an aching in it?" "Well, at all events," exclaimed the young man, "I've got a pretty fair balance in the savings bank, and I want you to be my wife. There!" "Well, James, since you put it in that light, I—"

That lack of lovers caused my lonely state,—Or take the remedies my sisters take, And see my eyes grow bright as tho' I bathed In the immortal fount De Leon sought In vain in Florida's peaceful shades. I oft have heard my married sisters say That good old Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription Would bring back color to a faded cheek—Restore the health of one who fain would die To rid herself of all the pain she feels."

The aforesaid spinster took the remedy—and forthwith took a husband also, having regained her health and blooming beauty.

Thousands of women owe their fresh, blooming countenances to the restorative effects of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. It is a positive cure for the most complicated and obstinate cases of leucorrhoea, excessive flowing, painful menstruation, unnatural suppressions, prolapsus, or falling of the womb, weak back, "female weakness," anteversion, retroversion, bearing-down sensations, chronic congestion, inflammation and ulceration of the womb.

Bile sometimes flows through the vein of humor. The fellow who is the subject of the joke always thinks so any way.

There are many people who try to escape from their shadow. Such as have done acts they do not even wish their shadow to know.

The things that are told children, and the old wife stories with which they are put off, are among the most contemptible of all the wrongs that are heaped upon the children under the pretext of befriending them. The little folk know well enough that they are being imposed upon, but they do not know how to protest; and yet, now and then one of them, with the bold frankness of childhood, does say out boldly just what it thinks. It was one of these naively born children who was being talked to about going to bed in the dark. She had, perhaps, been taught to be afraid, by being told that she must not fear, that being the approved method of instructing the little folk in this branch of their education; but in any case, whatever the method, she had learned her lesson, and she was very satisfactorily afraid. "But, my dear," her mother said to her one night, when the child was more than usually dismayed by the prospect of being alone in the dark in bed, "why should you be afraid in the dark?" "God is there." Her little daughter regarded her with troubled eyes. "But, mamma," she said, "what if he is; what difference does that make?"

THEMIS

Vol. II.

SACRAMENTO: SATURDAY, JANUARY 10, 1891.

No. 47.

THEMIS: Published weekly, by J. H. MILLER & Co. Publication Office, 410 J Street. Subscription—One year, by mail, $3 00; six months, by mail, $1 50, in advance; per month, by carrier, 25 cents. (Entered at the Post Office at Sacramento as second-class matter.)

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
J. H. MILLER, Managing Editor.

With this issue THEMIS passes into a different management. The change was made necessary by reason of the appointment of Mr. Johnston to the office of Superintendent of State Printing. John H. Miller, who for some years was connected with the editorial department of the Record-Union, succeeds to the business control, and will fill the position of managing editor. There will be no change so far as the editorial writers are concerned, and the paper will be conducted precisely as it has been since its establishment. It is gratifying to say that an investigation into its business, necessarily made in arranging for its transfer, has shown it to be upon a firm basis, and in all reasonable probability there will be soon added to it more attractive features. We are grateful for the patronage we have received, and know we will receive in the future, and feel that we have been able through the medium of THEMIS to be of benefit.

The Legislature is now organized and the heads of the executive departments have been installed. We are confident, from what we have observed of the campaign course and the appointments made, that Governor Markham will conduct his administration strictly upon business principles and independently. He received his nomination and election without the usual pledging to men and measures that have been crippling to some former administrations, and which have resulted in disadvantage to the interests of the State. We have been in a position to know of the harrassments with which officers who have the dispensation of patronage are beset and of the unreasonable requests that are made. We feel, however, that in the selection of those who will perform service for the State in the executive departments, in subordinate capacities, consideration will be paid more to the abilities of the persons than to the political influence that will back them. Very many forget that in the management of an important office there is a serious hampering if the head of the department has under him men not of his own selection, and in whom he has no reliance as to ability or integrity. Yet it is, there are very many who are supposed to wield political influence who will cold-bloodedly recommend and importune the appointment of individuals to positions of responsibility in the offices of others, who are absolutely unqualified and in some instances tainted. It is fortunate, however, that as a rule our public officers have exercised independence in making their selections.

The Legislature is now organized, and to the people and to the Governor it sends its message that it is ready to transact the business needed by the people from its branch of the government. The question is, what legislation is needed. In our judgment there is very little except the repeal of a great number of the useless laws of this State. We are aware that each member desires to make a record to which he can point with pride when he returns to his constituents; there are some, however, who find it prudent not to go back home. The experience of one who has served a term in the Legislature leaves a very unfavorable impression of the wisdom of the people in the selection of the persons to make and unmake laws for them. We look back to our observations when a member of the lower house, and it was but Providence that prevented the passage of iniquitous measures. Out of a body of eighty men, selected from different localities in the State, there is usually, and we may say as a rule, a curious mixture. There are some, and usually quite a number, who want to make a record to pave their way to future political preferment. In very many instances they make too much of a record and pass the balance of their lives in the contemplation of the ingratitude of republics. There is another class, and generally of young men from the remote interior, who believe they are the chosen instruments to reform the world and who load themselves down with bills they believe will correct evils that have existed since the time of Moses, and doubtless will exist until this planet will be obliterated. Such men are always disappointed that when the statutes are printed their bills are not promulgated as laws. There are others, and it must be said too many, whose only aim is to capture the almighty dollar. It is rather amusing to observe the methods they resort to, and if they could see themselves as others on the inside see them they would doubtless conclude their appropriate place would be in the ward of mild lunatics at Stockton rather than in the chambers of the Legislature. Fortunately there are usually enough of level headed and brainy men to check the influences of the impracticable, the ignorant and the vicious. We have not sufficient acquaintance with the personnel of the present Legislature to form judgment, and hope the people will not at the ending of the session be justified in placing upon them and their acts the seal of condemnation.

Coming down to the question of what legislation is necessary, we esteem it that the most important should be upon the matter of the revision of the State text books and that of ballot reform. We have repeatedly pointed out the inexcusable errors that exist in the compilation of the text books, and it would seem we are almost justified in saying there was a deliberate intention to make the books unpopular. The law providing for the compilation and publication of the school books for our children is among the wisest that has ever been enacted, and we know that its passage was effected after a most determined opposition by those interested in private text books. The only fault in the matter has been in the compilation, as we have indicated, and in our judgment in that particular, there should be a decided reform. Upon the question of a change in the law with regard to ballots, we believe there should be a change, and that the legislation of this State should keep pace with the modern legislation of the East.

The frequent occurrences of bright and intelligent boys, with a promising future before them, coming to grief by an indulgence in the flash and dangerous literature that stock the news stands and is hawked about the streets, and the young girls whose passions are fevered by evil novels, is something astounding, and calls loudly for action to avert the dangers that beset them. For this state of affairs parents are largely to blame for not giving to the growing boy or girl the proper entertaining reading matter. Parents are thoughtless and do not provide healthy books, periodicals, and clean literary journals to furnish nourishing literary food for the young minds. The sketches in Harpers' Young People and St. Nicholas, and very many of the magazines and literary papers, serve to give the youthful minds an appetite for such reading as will store them with useful knowledge. Here they learn history and philosophy, because the little fictions are clothed in the flesh and blood of facts and history. Bad books, flash journals, not to mention some of the alleged great dailies, do not furnish a nourishing food for the minds of our youth. All children crave some exciting reading matter, and it is the parents' duty to see to it that the proper kinds are placed in their hands.

It is now ten years since the present Constitution of this State became the organic law. After a decade of trial, in very many important respects, this instrument has proved a failure as a means of economic and practical government. The Legislature now in session should take this question into consideration and provide for a better form of organic law for the future by taking the prime steps for a new Constitution. It has been demonstrated that under the existing form of government, our Supreme Court cannot meet the demands made upon it, and the only relief must come through a change in the Constitution. There is a vast waste of public money also in the support of a number of Boards and Commissions. We have no practical use for either the Board of Equalization or the Railroad Commission. The Courts have interpreted the Constitution and laws so as to make the Board of Equalization a legal nonentity. The Railroad Commission has likewise proved a failure so far as regulation of freight and fares are concerned. Within the next four years there must be a change in these matters in order to secure an economic government.

Very many men seeking subordinate positions by appointment have an idea that a money consideration must be paid to somebody in order to secure favor. Men who are sincere, when asking the aid and influence of friends to attain political preferment at the hands of heads of departments, often propose to "put up" for that influence. This notion is the outgrowth of the infamous action of political brokers, who have long held sway in the large cities, particularly in San Francisco. Indeed, in this city there are those who have made it a business to exact—extort is the more correct term—money from applicants for positions. We have been called upon in a number of instances to exercise our influence, by reason of close friendship, to secure places for them, and this has been accompanied with the damnable proposition that there was "something in it" for that influence. There is no doubt that in the past many of those holding subordinate positions under the city, county and State governments have been compelled to allow a percentage of their salaries to those harpies. When approached by the poor but persistent applicants with these offers, one impulse was to at once denounce the parties, but when we consider the infamous system which has characterized political party management, we cannot blame these men for using the means they think to be potent with the powers that control the patronage. We hope and believe that the new administration, county and State, is not subject to these imputations. Of course we recognize the fact that those who have fought the political battles and earned recognition, should receive due consideration, but the person who would or could seek preferment by and through the influence of bribery is not worthy of a thought, other than of contempt. The officer who would take, or allow anyone to take for him, a valuable consideration for a position, is not worthy of a public trust. We make these few remarks because they have been prompted by actual propositions to us and our friends.

Prof. J. I. D. Hinds in a recent review article urges that agnosticism is an evidence of faith. The learned divine says: "I think that agnosticism should be regarded as one of the hopeful signs of the times. Atheism used to be the popular thing, but science and philosophy have now shown that its position is untenable. To prove that God does not exist, one must have complete knowledge of all time, all space, and all being. The atheist is thus compelled to yield his ground, and so he compromises by becoming an agnostic. This is equivalent to the admission that there may be truth in the theistic hypothesis after all. Now, the agnostic having yielded this much, is under obligation either to accept theism or furnish a better explanation of the universe. He can not long remain an agnostic. His very nature will drive him to faith in some hypothesis. Agnosticism is, then, a mean between atheism and theism, and, from the atheist's point of view, is a step in the direction of faith. There are many questions of vital importance which neither science nor philosophy can ever hope to solve. Agnosticism closes all access to such and leaves the soul in darkness; faith, looking beyond knowledge, lifts the veil and pours a flood of cheerful light upon them. The world is moving. The agnostic will have his reign and then go his way just as the atheist has done."

The infamy of the wholesale pardons by the retiring accidental Governor, is beyond all precedent. The vilest and most vicious murderers, and other felons, have been released. It is stated openly that there has been a system of brokerage whereby pardons are secured for a consideration, and that a certain citizen of Sacramento has been the agent in this infamous business, so as to screen the more important factors in the business. The good and law abiding citizens stand appalled at this wanton and reckless disregard of the decrees of Courts and verdicts of juries. There has been a violent cry against the miscarriage of justice through the agency of juries, but now comes an executive who, when juries have been found that do their duties, disregards their acts and makes wholesale pardons without cause.

Governor Markham's inaugural address was brief and to the point. He did not propose to reform the world at once, or by talk. Taxation must be reduced. Ballot reform is necessary, but care must be taken and the proposed amendments adopted with caution. Trading in legislative bodies is reprehensible. Labor controversies are delicate questions and demand wise consideration. Legislative apportionment must be just, so as to give each section of the State fair representation. All parties agree that the Chinese exclusion Acts must be enforced and the borders guarded against invasion by cheap Chinese laborers. The Governor makes some practical remarks on the hydraulic mining, and the production of gold in this State, and advises careful congressional action in the matter. Nothing could be more encouraging than the present outlook, affecting nearly every branch of her industries. The legislation in the first session of this Congress is especially encouraging to the rapid development of a large number of our horticultural and mineral resources. Those interested in the production of the raisin, the orange, the prune, and other fruits, and in the manufacture of sweet wines, have received substantial encouragement from the general government. The vast silver mines show very gratifying and largely increased activity, while the immense deposits of tin, so long known to us, but absolutely valueless, are now being developed, and will add enormously to our productions.

BY SEA TO SIBERIA.

The Latest Triumph in Arctic Navigation—Captain Wiggins' Theory Proven Well-founded.

A sea route to Siberia is the latest item of interest regarding the northern regions. Only a few years ago such an idea would have been deemed preposterous. Within a few weeks, indeed, there was but dim hope that certain expectations which had been formed would be fulfilled, and certain efforts which were being made in the direction indicated were as yet pronounced vain and chimerical. What was so recently, however, only an idea, has become a fact. A sea route to Siberia has been discovered, and the discovery has, by those best qualified to judge, been deemed an event of high importance—one of the most important in modern times.

Towards the end of July last two ships, with a small tug for the river work, were dispatched from London, their instructions being that they should penetrate the Kara sea, enter the estuary of the Yenissei and proceed as far up the river as possible. The two ships, with the little tug, made the voyage bravely, without any accident, from London to Karaoul, 160 miles up the Yenissei, in thirty-nine days. The voyage was accomplished in this space of time in spite of strong and continuous northeasterly winds and heavy ice floes, which occasioned no little delay. They remained at Karaoul nineteen days, and took twenty-six days to return to London. The entire trip, it will thus be seen, covered eighty-four days, or two months and twenty-three days.

Yenisseisk, the capital of the province of the same name, is about 1500 miles up the Yenissei from its mouth, or about 1350 from Karaoul. The town has a population of from eight to ten thousand and is the center of trade for a large part of the interior. At Karaoul the ships halted and the cargoes were transferred to the riverine boats, cargoes being also secured from the riverine boats in return. Making allowance for the distance between Karaoul and Yenisseisk, the calculation was that when the ships had reached London the rich cargoes which they had taken from the Thames in July would just be finding storage at the docks of the Siberian city.

The immediate practical result of this latest expedition, the first of a really commercial character, is the virtual establishment of a sea route to the very heart of Siberia, which means the establishment of a new trade outlet, and probably a most prosperous trade center. Of course, it is well known that the Kara sea is not navigable at all seasons of the year; but as a result of this voyage, the conclusion has been reached that if Siberia-bound vessels do not leave British ports later than the first week in August they will have sufficient time to reach Karaoul, exchange their cargoes and accomplish the home voyage the same season. It has been further determined that no great danger is to be apprehended for vessels of heavy draught, from the peculiar character of the estuary of the Yenissei. It is broad as well as long, studded with numerous islands, and swept continuously almost by northeasterly winds. The water, it was believed, was shallow, and from these various causes the conviction had been arrived at that the navigation of the estuary would be perilous to vessels of any draught. This delusion, which proved fatal to the expedition of last year, has also been dispelled. On this last occasion the two merchantmen, with the little tug, sailed up the estuary nearly two hundred miles, exchanged cargoes with a flotilla from the upper reaches of the river, and sailed home again. The conclusion is not unwarranted that there is no serious hinderance to navigation in the ordinary conditions of the estuary of the Yenissei.

How has this revolution been brought about? Like most other results of a similar kind, it is the fruit of much labor and personal self-sacrifice. Originally engaging the time and attention and the means of one man, the scheme came to interest many persons of means and influence; but from first to last it has been distinctively a private enterprise. Capt. Wiggins is to be credited with the paternity of the idea; and since 1874 he has made fifteen voyages to give his idea practical shape. At first he worked on his own means, and when these were exhausted assistance began to come to him from outside sources. Latterly, a sort of syndicate was formed, and prominent among Wiggins' friends and helpers were Mr. Albert Gray and the Milburns, the great shipping firm of Newcastle and London. In April of last year an appeal was made in the shape of a confidential circular inviting subscriptions. Money came in from private individuals all over the country, and Wiggins was able to set out in his little ship Labrador, although a little too late, as experience proved, to make what some were pleased to think would be not only the final experimental trip, but one which should settle the question of the feasibility of a sea route to Siberia. Wiggins reached the Kara sea and sailed to the mouth of the Yenissei. In none of his former voyages had he encountered so much ice. He feared to penetrate the estuary. At the mouth of the estuary he waited for the riverine boats. At the head of the estuary the riverine boats waited for the Labrador. The result was that they never met. Total want of funds at the beginning of the year forced Wiggins and the Labrador to South America, but the voyage was so arranged that if a fresh expedition were arranged for the present year, the captain, his boat and well-trained men could be on hand. Unhappily, however, the boat met with an accident and had to be laid up in dock. When the expedition which had ended so fortunately was arranged, Wiggins was unable to come on and take charge.

The captain, it is understood, is greatly chagrined because he has failed to seize the prize which was so nearly within his grasp. There are many who sympathize with him. It ought, however, to be some consolation to the captain that the two ships which traversed the Kara sea were in charge of old Labrador mates, and that his brother was in command of the tug. Besides, the work is not all over. He has the possible glory of future years before him. The enterprise is and ever will be associated with his name, and if he has not made the final discovery he has the satisfaction of knowing, and of knowing that the world knows it, that but for him the discovery would not now be made.

What is the value of this discovery? Its value is mainly commercial. There are people who now are disposed to belittle the value of Siberia. Good enough, they say, as a place of exile for Nihilists, but that is all. Such was not the opinion of Capt. Wiggins during his voyages. Such is not his opinion now. Such has never been the opinion of his friends. And such is not the opinion of some of the men best acquainted with the regions which this new sea route promises to open up. To one of the promoters of the undertaking Baron Nordenskjöld recently wrote: "Allow me to express my most cordial compliments and well wishes to the energetic and foresighted promoters of the undertaking. I am persuaded that its success will at once be regarded as an event rivaling in importance the return to Portugal of the first fleet loaded with merchandise from India. Siberia surpasses the North American continent as to the extent of cultivatable soil. The Siberian forests are the largest in the world. Its mineral resources are immense. Its climate, excepting the Tundra and the northernmost forest region, healthy, and as favorable for culture of cereals as any part of Europe." This may be a somewhat rose-colored picture, which time and further discovery may dim. But it is the language of a man who knows more about the region of which he speaks than any other man in Europe or America. And it is undeniable that in those very regions through which the Yenissei runs there are gold fields which might be profitably worked, and corn lands which are only awaiting the facilities of transit to compete with India and Southern Russia, and possibly even North America. The future, of course, will be greatly dependent on the attitude which the Russian Government may assume. If no hindrances are offered from this quarter, a new field of enterprise has been thrown open to the world.—N. Y. World.

A Letter from General Sutter.

The following letter from General Sutter to Governor Alvarado appears in the current number of the Century, by the kindness of the family of the latter. It gives a glimpse of the relation of the two men in 1841. The "body of American farmers" referred to were evidently the party whose experiences General Bidwell narrated in the November Century, the "young man" being "Jimmy" John.

A su Excelencia Señor Don Juan Bautista Alvarado Gobernador Constitucional de las dos Californias, en Monterey.

EXCELLENT SIR! Allow me to write you this time in English, because I like not to make mistakes in an expression.

I have the honour to send you with this an Act, of a committed Crime on this place; please give me your Orders what I have to do with the Delinquent which is kept as a Prisoner here.

Delinquent Henry Bee was put in Irons, but his friends bound themselves for 1000 Dollars Security, when I would take the irons from him, in which their Wishes I consented.

John Wilson, Black Jack, is well known as at life he was a bad Character, which may be something in Bee's favor.

Waiting for your Orders, I shall keep the Delinquent in Prison.

The Trapping party from the Columbia River will be here in about 8 Days, under Command of Mr. Ermatinger, I am also waiting for one of my friends a German Gentleman with the same party, I believe he travels for his pleasure.

A strong body of American farmers are coming here; a young Man of the party got lost from the party since 10 Days, nearly starved to death and on foot, he don't know which direction the party took, I believe he will come about the Direction of the Pueblo.

I was also informed that an other Company is coming stronger than this under Mr. Fanum [Farnum].

Some very curious Rapports came to me, which made me first a little afraid, but after two hours I got over the fit.

I remain, Excellent Sir!

Very Respectfully

Your

Most Obedient Servant,

J. A. SUTTER.

NEUVA HELVETIA, November 4, de 1841.

P. S.—In a short time I will have a Secretary who is able to write Spanish.

The Man with the Iron Mask.

The man with the Iron Mask was a mysterious prisoner whom Louis XIV. kept in close confinement for twenty-four years, first at Pignerol, then at the Isle of Ste. Marguerite, and finally in the Bastille, where he died November 19, 1703. He was never seen without the famous mask, which was not really made of iron, however, but of black velvet, furnished with steel springs, to allow for the motion of the face in eating. It is not likely that the secret will ever be satisfactorily solved. After the destruction of the Bastille, the register of the prison was searched in vain for something that would throw light on the mystery. Napoleon himself made an unsuccessful attempt to investigate it. Numerous conjectures have from time to time been made and have obtained more or less credence. The Iron Mask has been variously supposed to be Fouquet, the disgraced Minister of Finance; Louis, Count of Vermandois, the illegitimate son of Louis XIV., punished in this manner for having struck the Dauphin; the turbulent Duc de Beaufort, commonly known as "the king of the markets;" the schismatic Armenian patriarch, Arwediecks, noted for his hostility to the Catholics of the East; and the Duke of Monmouth, illegitimate brother of James II., although the fate of all these personages has been otherwise chronicled by history. A more widely accepted story, which originated with Voltaire, made him an illegitimate son of Anne of Austria, Louis XIV.'s mother, by either Cardinal Mazarin or the Duke of Buckingham. The Abbé Soulaire, in 1790, broached a theory which has proved very popular with dramatists and novelists. He made the Iron Mask a twin brother of Louis XIV. A prophecy having foretold disaster to the royal family from a double birth, Louis XIII. had caused the last born of the twins to be brought up in secret. Louis XIV. learned of his twin brother's existence only after Mazarin's death, and the brother, having found the secret of his birth by means of a portrait, was condemned to perpetual imprisonment. Zschokke and Fournier have both written tragedies in which this view is accepted. Alexandre Dumas has a romance called "The Iron Mask," in which he ingeniously avails himself of this story of the twin birth by making the mask the real Louis XIV., who is deposed by a conspiracy, and in his place is substituted his twin brother. The remarkable likeness between the two facilitates the deception. In the present day the generally accepted theory and one which seems to fit all the known facts of the case, is that which identifies the prisoner with Count Ercole Antonio Matthioli, Senator of Mantua and private agent of the duke, who suffered this long and strange imprisonment for having deceived and disappointed the king of France in a secret treaty for the purchase of the fortress of Casal, the key of Italy, the agents of Spain and Austria having offered him a higher bribe. The punishment was obliged to be secret, and even the identity of the victim was concealed, because to make it public would have exposed the shame of the two principals to the scheme. Moreover, his very capture and imprisonment was a flagrant violation of the rights of nations, which would have aroused the indignation of Europe against France.

A Glimpse of Domestic Life in 1827.

The ladies of Monterey in 1827 were rarely seen in the street, except very early in the morning on their way to church. We used to go there attended by our servants, who carried small mats for us to kneel upon, as there were no seats. A tasteful little rug was considered an indispensable part of our belongings, and every young lady embroidered her own. The church floors were cold, hard, and damp, and even the poorer classes managed to use mats of some kind, usually of tulle woven by the Indians.

The dress worn in the mornings at church was not very becoming; the rebozo and the petticoat being black, always of cheap stuff, and made up in much the same way. All classes wore the same; the padres told us that we must never forget that all ranks of men and women were equal in the presence of the Creator, and so at the morning service it was the custom to wear no finery whatever. One mass was celebrated before sunrise, for those whose duties compelled them to be at work early; later masses took place every hour of the morning. Every woman in Monterey went daily to church, but the men were content to go once a week.

For home wear and for company we had many expensive dresses, some of silk, or of velvet, others of laces, often of our own making, which were much liked. In some families were imported laces that were very old and valuable. The rivalry between beauties of high rank was as great as it could be in any country, and much of it turned upon attire, so that those who had small means often underwent many privations in order to equal the splendor of the rich.

Owing to the unsettled state of affairs for a generation in Mexico and in all the provinces, and the great difficulty of obtaining teachers, most of the girls of the time had scanty educations. Some of my playmates could speak English well, and quite a number knew something of French. One of the gallants of the time said that "dancing, music, religion, and amiability" were the orthodox occupations of the ladies of Alta California. Visitors from other countries have said many charming things about the manners, good health, and comeliness of these ladies, but it is hardly right for any of us to praise ourselves. The ladies of the province were born and educated here; here they lived and died, in complete ignorance of the world outside. We were in many ways like grown-up children.

Our servants were faithful, agreeable, and easy to manage. They often slept on mats on the earthen floor, or, in the summer time, in the courtyards. When they waited on us at meals we often let them hold conversations with us, and laugh without restraint. As we used to say, a good servant knew when to be silent and when to put in his cuchara (or spoon).—Century.

A broker, calling at the house of a book-collecting friend, was informed by the latter's wife that her husband was out. "Gone fishing for books," explained the lady. "What bait does he use?" inquired the broker; and then, without waiting for an answer he again queried, "Bookworms?"

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

Two American authors are engaged on a new comedy for Sol Smith Russell. In the meantime, he is doing so well with A Poor Relation, that he will continue it all this season.

Complicated throat troubles have necessitated the temporary withdrawal of Barney Fagan from Cleveland's Minstrels. Mr. Fagan is to be one of the stars of a farce-comedy next season, called A High Roller.

Joseph Haworth has entered into an engagement for five years with Mr. H. S. Taylor, under whose management he will star next season in a new romantic play by an American author. Mr. Haworth will also have a try at "Hamlet" and "Othello."

Charles T. White, one of the best known of the old-time minstrels, is in the cast of C'Reilly an' the 400. The part he has to play will be a small one, but it is a good little bit at that, and there is little doubt that the veteran will get all out of it that it is worth.

One of the features of the Dr. Bill performance that commanded attention at the start was the kangaroo dance, a terpsichorean diversion introduced in the first act. The dance is introduced by one of Dr. Bill's ballet-girl patients, and it is startling and unconventional, quaint in movement, and unquestionably graceful. The dancer dances in street costume, so that her pirouettes take on a piquancy that would be absent if the costume had a theatrical character. But it is nothing more than piquancy, although Ella Wheeler Wilcox and other guileless poetesses and writers have attacked it, and described the dance as everything it should not be. Whatever may be said about it, however, on the score of its morality, it must be admitted that, illustrated as it is by Miss Allen's graceful and twinkling toes, it is a marvel of graceful movement.

Herrmann has concocted a little romance to go with one of his chief tricks, and this tells the story of a young girl taking the place of her lover, who is condemned to death. There are on the stage, in addition to the lover and the girl, a number of supernumeraries dressed as Russian soldiers. These, however, are present simply to fill up the stage. They have nothing whatever to do with the trick. In the center of the stage are four iron posts of about an inch and a half in diameter and probably eight feet in height. From these posts, by solid iron chains, is suspended a plain, heavy board of ash, just large enough to hold a good-sized man. This board is fitted with iron fastenings for the ankles, wrists and neck. A committee is selected from the audience to place upon this board the assistant of Professor Herrmann. The man is laid on his back, with his arms and legs extended, and the gyves are fastened with Yale locks by the committeemen around the ankles, wrists, and neck of the man. When this is done a curtain is drawn around the three sides of the oblong made by the posts. But it does not touch the floor by two feet, and the spectators in the auditorium can see under and above the plank on which the man has been apparently so well locked. In less than a minute after the curtains have been drawn the man whom the committee locked to the board appears at the back of the auditorium and walks calmly down the aisle to the stage. Simultaneously the curtain is drawn, and there, in the place where the man was, lies Mme. Herrmann, locked identically as the man had been. Herrmann did the trick yesterday in forty-six seconds. He expects to do it even quicker than this when the apparatus works more easily.

Book Chat.

What is in some sort a test of George Meredith's popularity in England is noted in the fact that R. Le Gallienne's book on the "Characteristics" of that author was sold out in the week of publication. A second edition is in the press:

Still on and upward, is the law, to bloom from simple germ;
And up and on the forms have merged, to man, from lowly worm;
As from the humble seed there springs the grand and mighty tree,
So from a single cell must start each thing that is to be.
As thus, from earth, all life has come, through forms, as fossils tell—
Each merging on to meet the needs that Nature answers well,
So from the germ to perfect bud in language deep and dumb,
They tell of all the varied forms through whence each kind has come.
O, mighty stranger from the clowd, so subtle and unread!
Didst thy electric spark but light, in crude albumen bed,
The flame of light in simple cell that sprung from humble clay,
To run the yet unfinished course now limning Reason's way?
O, Monad from the plasmic bed that forms each living frame,
Begetting fields for Flora and wide world's in Fauna's name;
From lowly place thy steps have trod to answer Nature's will,
And climb the paths of destiny yet up and onward still!

Professional Chat.

The St. Louis doctor who charged $10 a visit and $100 a day because his patient was wealthy, has discovered that it is better to fail in collecting some debts than to expose the secrets of his practice.

Dr. Pillsbury—"Well, Mr. Sceptic, did you follow my prescription?" Sceptic—"No. If I had I would have broken my neck." Dr. Pillsbury—"Why, what do you mean?" Sceptic—"I threw the prescription out of the window."

In a jury trial in a small town not many miles from civilization, the rural gentlemen into whose hands the fate of the plaintiff and defendant was placed, were so stubbornly divided that they were some twenty odd hours in reaching a verdict. As they left the Court, after having rendered their verdict, one of them was asked by a friend what the trouble was. "Waal," he said, "six on 'em wanted to give the plaintiff $4000, and six on 'em wanted to give him $3000, so we split the difference an' gave him $500."

Here is an interesting anecdote bearing upon the fame of Count von Moltke. The greatest of men are indebted to drivers of cabs in great cities, and very often the greatest of men reward cabmen with no more than their legal fare, and are economically indignant at the thought of a pour-boire. On one occasion the strategist of modern Europe took a cab from the Reichstag to his home, and when he arrived there the cabby did not wait for payment, but drove off, remarking, "it was a great honor to drive you, Field Marshal!" So it was, but the honest veteran did not regard the compliment quite in that light. He found out the name of the cabby, and then sent him his photograph inscribed with his autograph: "Moltke to his cabman." In Prussia that gift, sentimental though it seems, would fetch the price of a cab horse any day.

The country lawyer is apt, in the course of his general practice, to see more of the humorous side of judicial ignorance than is to be found in the somewhat more limited range of his urban brother. As an instance of this state of affairs, the Drawer has received the following anecdote: A certain suspect in a criminal trial before a justice whose acquaintance with Blackstone would seem to be limited, having clearly established his innocence of the charge against him by an alibi, the prosecuting attorney remarked to the Court: "I think, your Honor, that this trial had better stop right here. The alibi has been fully established." "I think so myself," replied his Honor, with an approving nod; and then summoning the prosecuting attorney to his side, he said, in a stage-whisper which was only too audible throughout the courtroom, "I say, what is the penalty for an alibi?"

The other day a Chicago doctor was summoned to attend a man who had been wounded in an accident, and, before relieving the pain of the sufferer, he ventured to raise the question of fees. The bystanders were inclined to take a sentimental view of the matter and the doctor was dismissed and a less mercenary healer called. The physician who was first summoned said that he had been very frequently called to attend men who had been injured in accidents, but he had never received fees from any of these, and he had made up his mind not to give his experience and time for nothing. No doubt there are a great many of the profession who will know how to sympathize with this physician. The Chicago papers are inclined to think that a physician has a right to look after the money due him even under such circumstances as those mentioned. But the truth is that neither the physician nor the minister can regulate his services by such strict business principles as can men of other followings. Both are under great moral obligations, by the very nature of their professions, to do more than they are paid for doing. It is a part of the glory of their profession that this is so, and it is this consideration which should keep selfish men, or men with a low degree of moral responsibility, from entering these professions. That minister never lived, no matter what capacity for meanness he might have, who would refuse to offer consolation to a dying man because he saw no way to get a fee out of it; and that physician should not be entitled to the respect of his neighbors who will not relieve the pain of a dying man or prevent an injured one from dying if he can, without asking about the reward he is to receive. Really, the work of a physician can not be placed upon a business basis any more than the work of a newspaper man or a minister. All must work largely from a sense of duty. All must regulate their hours of labor by the necessities of the case. All must give up many days of toil without monetary reward and receive payment in the consciousness of the good they have done and of the pleasant emotions they have aroused in their own hearts.

Miss Braddon, the English novelist, who in private life is Mrs. Maxwell, is described as a tall, dark, earnest-looking woman, with peaked features and a complexion indicating long hours of work. She talks well, dresses expensively and wears costly jewels.

Only one member of the numerous family of the Bonapartes lives in Corsica, the home of the great founder of the family. This is the Princess Marianne, wife of Lucien Bonaparte, who, separated from her husband, lives a life of seclusion in the village of Ajaccio.

The ox-hide shields of ancient warriors were said to be invulnerable to the sharpest arrow or spear. The secret of this strength lay in their make. Along with the hide the shield manufacturer used to cut off the beast a layer of what passes now-a-days for boarding-house steak.

Wooden-spoon making is an extensive industry in Russia, 30,000,000 being the annual product. It will be remembered that it was one of these household utensils with which Mrs. Squeers, of Dotheboys Hall, used to tap reluctant pupils on the head when they hesitated to swallow their brimstone and molasses.

There are fifty Yale graduates in Tokio, Japan, a fact which clearly indicates that Tokio is a lively and progressive city in spite of its Oriental traditions. They are now about to form an alumni association, the result of which will probably be that Yale will loom up before the Japanese as the one and only great American institution.

"Grief is the agony of an instant—the indulgence of grief the blunder of a life," wrote Disraeli; and he added the philosophic observation that "It is not in human nature to endure extremities; and sorrows soon destroy either us or themselves. As we retain but a faint remembrance of our felicity, it is but fair that the smartest stroke of sorrow should, if bitter, be brief."

The two sides of the human face are not exactly alike, and a German biologist asserts, that the lack of symmetry is, as a rule, confined to the upper parts of the face. In two cases out of five the eyes are out of line, and seven persons out of every ten have stronger sight in one eye than in the other. Another singular fact is that the right ear is almost universally shorter than the left, not only a little shorter, but enough to show even in inexact measurement.

There is no sorrow that sleep cannot subdue. It is only when sleep cannot be called that the human mind becomes taxed beyond physical endurance. Those who have suffered the pangs of neuralgia or rheumatism can understand what a heaven it is to have the sweet repose from a sound sleep. We mean a natural sleep. The quiet which is the result of narcotics, while temporary relief, leaves no such refreshing influences as flow from natural sleep.

When the Sioux go on the warpath, in anything like reasonable weather, they exercise great economy in dress. They paint their ponies with red and black paint in crosses. They also wear their hair loose and flowing, and put a liberal allowance of red and black paint on their faces. Decorative art prevails largely in their make-up. Bugs, reptiles and animals, as nearly as the rudely artistic mind of the Sioux can contrive, are painted on their foreheads and chins, while a cross of red and black paint adorns each cheek.

The following appeared in the last issue of the Sunday Union: John H. Miller, formerly connected with the editorial staff of the Record-Union, has purchased the Sacramento THEMIS, heretofore published by A. J. Johnston, who has been appointed State Printer. Mr. Miller has had many years' experience in the newspaper business, is a graceful, fluent and incisive writer, and will give to THEMIS a dash and vim characteristic of his work. Winfield J. Davis and W. A. Anderson will remain as the editorial writers of the paper.

The Evening Bee has entered upon its sixty-ninth volume, stronger, brighter, and better than ever. It has published 10,995 papers, all of them full of spice, wit, and sarcasm. The editorials of the Bee have always been fearless and pungent. It has been a terror to evil doers, and derelict public officials, and ever an exponent for the best interests of the city. Its editorial staff to-day is unexcelled, as the columns of bright, fresh, and original matter each day bear evidence. Long live the Bee. May she buzz, and buzz, and buzz, and gather lots of honey.

Every profession, trade and business carries a rear guard made up of laggards who are constantly snapping, snarling and crying over their poor luck, but who never have anything to say about their poor pluck. But those who keep up with the procession and lead instead of follow have no ears for the lamentations of the stragglers, and when these drop out of line are not missed by those whose company they kept, or the patient public.

A year ago the doctors were not fully agreed as to whether la grippe, which had prostrated thousands of victims abroad, had really arrived in this country or not. That strange malady was, in fact, causing almost as great a stir in the medical world as the Koch lymph is producing these days. A little later last winter there was no longer room for doubt as to the presence of the gripphere, as multitudes of its victims can testify. The predictions made a few weeks ago, that it would come again this season, and with renewed violence, have not been fulfilled thus far, and fortunately there are no signs that they will be.

Everybody knows in a general way how much more talk than work is done in the world, but few people realize the fact until it is reduced to figures. A speaker of average rapidity will use about one hundred words a minute, and in conversation the rate is about the same. Now suppose the average talker talks four hours a day he will repeat 24,000 words each day, equal to twelve columns of the Globe or to forty-eight pages of a book of ordinary size. In a year he would have uttered words that will fill 17,520 pages, or thirty-five volumes of 500 pages each, and in thirty years 1,050 volumes will be filled with the nothings that are said from moment to moment. This calculation is for a man; for a woman, of course, the figures would be at least doubled.

During the present century three girl queens have, before the advent of Queen Wilhelmina, almost simultaneously ascended the throne of an European nation: Maria da Gloria of Portugal, Isabella of Spain, and Victoria of England. The two first had the misfortune of attaining to the regal power while still mere children. There has been a wide difference between the histories of the spoiled daughter of Spain and the headstrong Portuguese damsel, and that of the grand and conscientious maiden of eighteen who was called upon to reign over Great Britain. By her close affiliations, through her sister, the Duchess of Albany, to the English Court, Queen Emma will probably profit by the example set by the Duchess of Kent in the education of her daughter.

Firecrackers are not made at all in this country. They are all imported, and come principally from China. About two years ago several manufacturers of fireworks here introduced the making of giant firecrackers, but the industry has not increased to any extent. No one in recent years has even attempted to make the small firecracker. The reason for this state of things is a financial one. There is no secret about the making of firecrackers, and we are just as well able to do it as anybody; but Chinese labor is so cheap that it does not pay to manufacture them in this country. The duty upon them is eight cents a pound, which amounts to something over 100 per cent. ad valorem; but the tariff would have to be considerably increased before it would pay to manufacture them in this country.

There are many who would like to see and hear Henry M. Stanley on the rostrum. We are in receipt of a letter and blank contract of subscription from Mr. Stanley's agent, John F. Bragg, 1418 Sutter street, San Francisco, asking us to agree to take tickets at $2.00 each. Few can afford to give this sum, and, indeed, the most affluent citizens would look long at $2.00 before investing it in a seat for any lecture. A little addition to the price of admission would purchase Stanley's recent book, which would be a much better and more lasting investment. It is true Mr. Stanley's time is limited, yet it would seem to be more in accord with public sentiment to fix the price of admission to his lectures at a more popular and reasonable figure. The greatest and most eloquent lecturers often found difficulty in securing a large attendance at much less rates of admission. The great African explorer has many warm admirers in this city, who would be delighted to listen to his wonderful adventures and experiences in the Dark Continent, but if the price of admission is fixed at $2.00 each, a large audience cannot be vouched for.

The Consummation of Infamy.

There is but pity, tearful pity, and general compassion for the unfortunate man who has just left the Governor's chair of this State to again become a private citizen, from which a cruel fate called him to disgrace the people for three years. We say he is pitted because he has allowed his soured and gangrened nature to avenge itself on an unoffending public at large, by turning loose among them the very worst convicts in the two State prisons, to prey on their lives and property again; and only in revenge on his party for having justly slapped his jaws in its State Convention by refusing to acknowledge that such a nondescript ever lived to defile an honorable and exalted place as this "circumstance" of California's history. That convention not only positively refused to pay him the poor honor of giving him a complimentary vote, but not one was there among those hundreds of delegates who could find an excuse in the man's public career to justify a resolution complimenting him; not even an excuse for his being. The poor old man felt it; the iron went into his soul; he swore vengeance, and right sorely has California realized the bitterness of that vengeance. The last days of his unhallowed public life must have been spent in a profound study of what acts he could perpetrate that would most insult and most greatly provoke the people. The result of that diligent study has been felt in the discharge from prison of scores of the very worst scoundrels he could possibly have selected from either prison. So evident is that fact, that one is tempted to believe that he has held consultations with the most vicious, and learned from them who would be the most dangerous to the people if set free; and after learning the fact, ordered their free papers made out, then complacently read the maledictions heaped on his head and laughed in the malice of his soul that he was able to avenge himself on his party insults, by cursing all the people of his adopted State.

Satan sat once high in the counsels of the heavenly hosts; he aspired to sit on the throne by the side of the great Jehovah; his temerity drove him to hell. Since his overthrow he has prowled over the world for the destruction of souls. Waterman aspired to be Governor; his people spurned him from before their feet, where he sought to prostrate himself. Afflicted and sore, he swore the citizens of an unoffending State should feel the venom of his poisoned soul. He possessed the power and he would take exquisite delight in seeing the public flee for the safety of their lives as he unlocked the doors of the prison houses and beckoned forth the only friends he can number in the future, and invited them to a continuance of the murders, rapes, rapine, robberies, perjuries, forgeries, bribes, ballot-box stuffings, arsons, larcenies, stage-stoppings and all the other crimes known to the law or to be yet invented. But oh, how prolific of reasons for these pardons! How the old man's soul went out in behalf of the poor felons! When the gubernatorial chair was first contaminated by his anatomy, his doughty secretary was wont to ironically sneer, "Oh, yes, all the prisoners are innocent, and they should all be out." Of course this was one of Boruck's sarcasms. But it seems some occult power has taught the secretary that truly they are all innocent. The peculiarity is that the poor devils who had not rich relatives or wealthy advocates are still in prison. One of the jokes of the entire business is Jack Cotton posing as a Mexican war veteran, and Dave Scannel, of the San Francisco Fire Department, shedding tears over Jack's confinement. Jack Cotton was a deserter from an English merchant ship just a few months before the murder, and never saw Mexico in his life; and it is doubtful if ever he had a gun or sabre in his hands. The truth is, he was too young when the Mexican war was fought to have been in it; and he is not sixty years of age, as represented. But Waterman did not want excuses; all he desired was to know if the scoundrel was the worst that could be found; if he was one who, like Jack Cotton, should have been skinned alive, or drawn and quartered, or burned at the stake, or if he was one like Fat Jack, who murdered a decrepit old woman while attempting to outrage her; then it was evidence enough for this soured, misanthropic, ancient politician, without personal friend or political party, to induce him to let them go among men again to renew their career of crime. It would be a fitting sequel now that the Governor and his pets are alike in being again free, that they hold a love feast at his home, organize an association, with the ex-Governor at the head, levy tribute on the State and collect it at the muzzle of pistols, as did John Bell, Murietta and Vasquez. But, God be praised, time has flown by and thrown Waterman into eternal oblivion, and may a pitying Providence forefend that a suffering State should ever again be so cursed by ignorance, stupidity, bull-headedness and a total disregard of the public.

Citrus Fair at Marysville.

Every arrangement has been made by the citizens of Marysville to make the Citrus Fair, which opens on Monday next, a success. It will continue five days. All the resources of Northern and Central California will be represented. The enterprise deserves a large attendance, and we doubt not that their hopes will be realized. Next Saturday will be Sacramento day at the fair. A special excursion train will leave the Southern Pacific depot in this city on Saturday, January 17th, at 9 o'clock A. M., by way of Davisville and Knights Landing, over the new road through Sutter county. Returning on Saturday evening, it will leave Marysville at 9 P. M. Fare for the round trip, $2.50.

President Gregory, of the State Board of Trade has appointed the following named gentlemen as a committee to represent the State Board of Trade at the fair. They are to meet at Marysville, at 1 o'clock P. M., on Saturday, January 17th: W. H. Mills, Vice President, San Francisco; John Q. Brown, General Manager, San Francisco; Jas. Morrissey, Stockton; Tyler Beach, San Jose; John P. Irish, San Francisco; N. P. Chipman, Red Bluff; J. S. Emery, Oakland; A. T. Hatch, Suisun; E. W. Jones, Los Angeles; E. Greer, Sacramento; A. A. Hibbard, Chico; Mark L. McDonald, Santa Rosa; M. M. Estee, Napa; Albert Gallatin, San Francisco; E. W. Maslin, Loomis.

Mortality of the State.

The deaths registered in 105 town districts of the State during the past month, in a population of 776,549, correspond to an annual rate of 17.72 a thousand, the total mortality having been 1,147. 155 deaths were due to zymotic diseases, giving an annual rate of 2,396 a thousand. Of these 58 were due to diphtheria, 39 to typhoid fever, 27 to cholera infantum, 16 to diarrhea and dysentery, 8 to cerebro-spinal fever, to scarlet fever, and 2 to whooping cough. 321 deaths resulted from diseases of the respiratory organs, giving an annual rate of 4.96 a thousand. Of these 162 were due to consumption, 115 to pneumonia, 24 to bronchitis, and 20 to pulmonary congestion; the rate being for consumption and pneumonia, 2.50 and 1.70, respectively. 76 deaths resulted from diseases of the heart. The average annual death rate from all causes occurring in the ten largest cities and towns in the State, and representing a population of 552,250, was 17.57. The highest rate for the month, occurring in cities having a population of 10,000 or more inhabitants, was reported from San Jose, the lowest from Stockton.—Occidental Medical Times for January.

May Success Attend It.

The Record-Union appeared this morning in a splendid new costume. We admire the enterprise of our neighbor. The new press and machinery are second to none in the Union. Another stroke of energy was the full and detailed account of the inaugural ball, with a description of the various costumes of the ladies. It would have been enjoyable for the management of that journal to have witnessed the eager demand for the Record-Union this morning.

This is how the late John Ruszits, the millionaire fur-dealer, got married. While abroad on a business trip he visited a friend in Sweden. While in his friend's house he heard someone in the next room playing on a piano. The pianist was a young lady from Bremen, who was visiting there. Turning to his friend, Mr. Ruszits said: "If I should ever marry, I would like to marry a woman like that." The gentleman went to the door and called the young lady in. "What do you think Mr. Ruszits just said?" he inquired. Of course the lady didn't know. Mr. Ruszits struck in and said: "Well, I'm not afraid to repeat it," and he proceeded to do so. The lady looked at him thoughtfully for a moment or two, and then said: "Well, I will accept." And they were married.

The idea seems to prevail that placing saucers filled with lime about a sick-room, or hanging up cloths wet with a solution of carbolic acid, or the burning of coffee, will free the air from the disease germs. There is no truth in this. The amount of chloride of lime needed to effect the purpose would be far in excess of that which anyone would think of putting into a room. Carbolic acid, when used as stated, does no good whatsoever; and as for burning coffee upon the stove, also cascarilla bark, pastilles, etc., they merely deodorize the air, without affecting in the slightest degree the poisons in it; moreover, they add to its impurities. Fresh air and sunlight are nature's disinfectants; let them be relied upon.

The young ladies of the freshman class at Colby University have selected the following class yell: "Co-ordination, ha, ha, ha, tesaras kai enuekonta dux femina facts, rah, rah, rah." It is said the girls stayed awake all night for a week inventing the yell; but they would show a greater aptitude for college instruction if they were to organize a foot-club.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

The Boston Howard Atheneum did a good business last week. The performance was exceptionally good.

Williams and Kelly will give a return presentation of U and I at the Metropolitan on Monday and Tuesday nights. Some new specialty attractions have been added since the last appearance.

Miss Adelaide Moore appeared at the Metropolitan on Wednesday and Thursday nights. The less said about the company the better. The star has the dower of beauty and fine form, but that is all. The company, with a very few exceptions, is not even tolerable.

The death of Emma Abbott was sudden and startling. This noted operatic artist has long held a high place on the operatic stage, and her love of money and applause has prompted her to continue when her vast accumulations of wealth should have actuated her to a life of ease and comfort.

The Great Society Event.

Last night the Capitol was ablaze with splendor. The Senate and Assembly Chambers looked like some dazzling fairy land. There were fashion and beauty among the women, gallantry and dignity with the men. There was the exquisite and the statesman, dignity and frivolity, all face to face. The several committees have done their duties well. Nothing was left undone to make this the greatest social event. The management was like clock-work, and reflects credit upon the executive ability of the gentlemen who managed the affair. A few minutes before eleven the grand march began, and it was a sight of splendor one sees seldom in a life time. The costumes of the ladies were as varied as they were beautiful. The hum of society small talk gave a charm to the scene. Brilliant uniforms added to the grandeur of the occasion. The programme of the grand march was as follows: Governor, Lieutenant Governor, Secretary of State, Controller, State Treasurer, Attorney General, Surveyor General, Superintendent of Public Instruction, State Board of Equalization, Railroad Commissioners, Supreme Court, Senators, Assemblymen, State Engineer, Adjutant General and Staff, Major General and Staff, Brigadier Generals and Staffs, Superintendent State Printing, Bank Commissioners, Fish Commissioners, Commissioner of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, Commissioner of Immigration, State Analyst, Insurance Commissioner, State Harbor Commissioners, Commissioners State Board of Horticulture, Commissioners State Board of Viticulture, State Board of Forestry, State Board of Silk Culture, State Prison Directors, State Insane Asylum Directors, Regents State University, Trustees State Library, Trustees State Mining Bureau, State Board of Health, State Board of Dental Examiners, State Board of Agriculture, citizens, etc. The dancing programme for the Assembly Chamber had fourteen numbers, while that of the Senate had twenty numbers.

In the Assembly Chamber the following comprised the management: Floor Manager, William Beckman; Floor Committee—F. S. Adams, B. B. Brown, Dr. Wm. Ellery Briggs, E. A. Crouch, E. B. Carroll, W. K. Cothrin, Max Hornlein, George W. Jackson, A. J. Johnston, George B. Katzenstein, W. S. Kendall, E. H. McKee, D. H. McKay, J. G. Martine, F. Wheeler Marston, J. N. Porter, J. E. Terry.

In the Senate these gentlemen officiated: Floor Manager, A. Abbott; Floor Committee—F. W. Birdsall, George B. Cosby, Jr., W. R. Cluness, Jr., E. J. Figg, George E. Hook, Henry A. Heilbron, F. T. Johnson, George W. Krauer, Charles K. Lipman, J. A. Moyuinan, Dwight Miller, Robert C. McCreary, W. C. Reith, G. C. Siumons, Jr., Adolph Scheld, Frank G. Smith, L. S. Upson. The whole affair was a brilliant success, and will be long remembered as a great social triumph.

A Just Measure.

Assemblyman Bruner has introduced a bill to pay Geo. Nelson $3,600 for false imprisonment in the State prison at Folsom. Nelson was the innocent victim of circumstances, and was sentenced to imprisonment at Folsom for 10 years. He served 13 months when his innocence was developed through a confession of a stage robber, and all the facts showed clearly the innocence of Nelson. He, however, suffered the torture of imprisonment and worked for the State for 13 months. The sum asked is but a small recompense for his sufferings.

A fashionable London hairdresser has invented a novelty called the "Ondulature." It consists of a kind of tortoise shell stick and brooch pin; the hair is twisted around it in a particular way, and with the aid of a wash or lotion the desired wave is achieved without employing the hot irons; but, naturally, the wave is not so durable as when the irons are used.

LOCAL BREVITIES.

Dr. Gill's Botanic Cough Syrup is a guaranteed remedy made in Sacramento. Will relieve the most troublesome cold almost instantly. Try it.

Stockmen's Liniment. For rheumatism and neuralgia, sprains and bruises its effect is magical. Both the above for sale by Kirk, Geary Co. and J. Hahn & Co.

O. F. Bergman, the well-known caterer, has bought his partner's interest in the El Dorado, at 826 J street, and is now the sole proprietor of that well-known resort.

Senator Stanford makes a handsome reply to the chairman of the joint Republican caucus, acknowledging the honor of his selection to succeed himself as United States Senator.

The sharp, dry north wind has exercised its influence on the mud in the streets, by drying the same up rapidly. It is decidedly more preferable than the damp, cold fogs which have hung over us for the past month.

There is warfare on the "well," at the State Capitol building. The Attorney General says it is against the law. Assemblyman Bledsoe says it's indecent and immoral. The rank and file, however, want their Shasta water and hard boiled eggs.

Assemblymen Bruner and Adams did some fine executive work in their management of the inauguration of the Governor and Lieutenant Governor. The time was so very short to accomplish this, that it required unusually prompt action on the part of the committee.

The many friends of George W. Chesley will be glad to learn that he has sufficiently recovered from his illness as to be able to attend to business again. No pioneer resident is better acquainted and more thoroughly appreciated than "Uncle George." He has a smile and a pleasant word for everyone.

The phonograph is a great invention, and that one at the Café Royal is doing a remunerative business. Lately the customers of the house have turned it to a very good account. For instance, last evening Drs. Swanson and Bainbridge were being bored by a reporter. Addressing the reporter, he said, "By the way, there is a new tune here to-day; just listen." The Dr. dropped a nickel in the slot, the reporter grabbed the transmitters, pressed them to his ears, and enjoyed a "whole brass band" for at least five minutes. When he turned around from the instrument the two medical gentlemen had "skipped." It took only five cents to get rid of him.

Every Legislature, like the traveling circus, has a number of impecunious hangers-on, both men and women. Many come to the city hoping to secure a salaried position about the halls of legislation, others to lobby bills, and still others simply to strike members for enough to buy their food and a night's lodgings. The same old familiar faces turn up every session, many of them having grown gray in the service. You can usually tell the women that are "sparring" the members for a living. They most generally are young, good looking, dress in widow's weeds and wear long crepe veils. When not working the legislators they are exhibiting in J and K streets. The town is full of them.

All who visited the State Capitol during the past four years became acquainted with Ed. S. Rego. He was the gentleman who explained the statuary of Columbus and Isabella. So often had he to repeat it every day that it became mechanical, and many of the frequenters of the building know it by heart. Genial and obliging, he was the right man in the right place. He would have remained the orator of the Capitol for another four years, had it not been for the snow-storm that buried the Democratic party in this State on the 5th of November. Rego hailed from Chico, but he has become so attached to Sacramento that he will reside in this city for the future. He has gone into business at "The Office," on Fourth street, between J and K.

She Could Probably Cook.

He (just introduced)—Perfectly charming night. I have seldom seen the stars look so bright. Are you fond of astronomy?
She—"N-o, I have never studied it."
He—"You dote on botany, I presume."
She—"I never studied that, either."
He—"Do you like geology?"
She—"I don't know anything about it."
He—"Ah! You are an enthusiast on one or more of the arts, no doubt—music, painting, sculpture, wood carving or repousse work?"
She—"I don't know anything about any of them. I'm a perfect ignoramus."
He—"Angelic creature! Will you be my wife?"

Hicks—Come, now, you ought to pay Smithers what you owe him. He's awfully hard up; lots of bills overdue, he tells me.
Wicks—That's just it. What's the sense of my paying him money? He'll go to work right off and squander it on his creditors.

The City Drug Clerk.

He is well up in physic, has a recipe for phthisic, that will cure a case that's chronic in the quickest sort of style. For while he was at college he absorbed all sorts of knowledge with a keenness and avidity that made his teachers smile.

He can tell you to a fraction, writing out the full reaction, how much maltose is converted when you brew a pint of beer. For on substances organic, whose origin's botanic, he's a mine of information and was never known to err.

He is up in mathematics, can explain electrostatics, when it comes to pharmacology he's a perfect mine of wealth.

He can analyze a water, and can tell you what you ought to do to make it fit to drink without injuring your health.

He explains the metric system with an air of sapient wisdom; he knows a little Latin, on a pinch "spricht etwas Deutsch."

He reads the leading journal, and his wit springs ever vernal, and when when discussing politics he's never in the lurch.

He can draw you soda water with an air of freezing hauteur, that quite precludes necessity for having any ice;

Though when customers are pretty he can be very witty, and the girls unite in saying that he's everything's that's nice.

Such a brainy aggregation is quite fit to rule a nation, yet he deals out pills and powders with a condescending air,

For a paltry compensation, that's a shame to his vocation, and I leave it to the public, do you think that this is fair?

—Pharmaceutical Era.

Quietelet, in his well known treatise "On Man," pointed out that the growth of town children is quicker than that of country children. The demands from the nutritive powers are larger, and consequently we can understand how it comes about that the educational burden is felt more by town children than their country cousins. Town life is not a natural life. If it has certain advantages, it also has sundry drawbacks. The imperfect development of the digestive organs has far-reaching consequences. The realization of the fact that the digestive difficulties of town dwellers lead them to adopt a dietary which is injurious in its after results, will cause them to correct it. Already, indeed, we see many blindly starting out on a new track in the spread of vegetarianism, along with the "Blue Ribbon." In this action they have not waited for physiology to pronounce an authoritative opinion, but have acted on their own account, guided by some instinctive impulse. Modifications in our food customs are required for town dwellers. They should have food which will nourish them, and sustain without any bad after effects, and which they can digest. Possibly, too, before long it will be found that some modification of the existing scheme of education is desirable in the interest of the weaker children. Possibly, too, it may be found that little town mites expand when restored to the country, and can lead a more natural life than that to which at present they are condemned by the growth of large towns, which exercise such a malign influence upon those who dwell therein, and especially those who are born and reared in such towns.

It is a well-known fact that both the Prince of Wales and the Empress Frederick are extremely amiable, treating every one with the utmost courtesy, but at the same allowing no one the slightest familiarity. A rather clever story is told in this connection of the Empress Frederick. Some ten years ago, when, as Crown Princess, she was spending the winter at Pelgi, on the Riviera with her three daughters, they were in the habit of making excursions in the neighborhood almost daily, traveling by train and taking their places among the other passengers in any carriage where they found places. On one of these occasions a Frenchman who happened to find himself in the same compartment with them, being ignorant—or affecting ignorance—of the rank of his fellow-travelers, was proceeding to light a cigar (in accordance with the universal custom of smoking on that line); but before doing so he turned to the Princess and politely inquired: "Does madam object to the smell of smoke?" "I do not know the smell, sir. Nobody has ever presumed to smoke in my presence," was the crushing reply.

Capt. Bitters.—It seems to me, Judge, that this cocktail isn't quite up to the mark. The brandy and absinthe are all there, but there is some deuced weakness about the flavor. Judge Jugson (tasting for himself).—Why, of course. It's that fool of a new bartender again. He's forgotten to put in the cayenne pepper or the dash of Worcestershire sauce. If the House Committee don't give him a shaking up, Captain, the fellow will surely poison us all yet; see if he does not. They drop a double complaint into the box without delay.

Father (severely).—Are you aware, young man, that card-playing at their clubs is the curse of the young men of this city? Son.—Well, governor, it depends on the men, you know, and the cards they hold.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of M. D. Thomson, an insolvent debtor.—M. D. Thomson, having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which it appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said M. D. Thomson is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said M. D. Thomson, debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the Court-room of said Court, on the 6th day of February, 1891, at 10 o'clock A. M., of that day, to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.

Dated 29th December, 1890.

W. C. VAN FLEET, Judge of the Superior Court.

PHILIP S. DRIVER, Attorney for Insolvent. ja3-5t

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO.—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to LOUIS C. MCADAMS, greeting: You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State of California, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 2d day of January, 1891, in which action Laura A. McAdams is plaintiff and you are defendant. That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To obtain a decree of said Court, dissolving the bonds of matrimony, now and heretofore existing between plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds of the failure of the defendant for more than one year last past to provide the plaintiff with the common necessities of life, he having the ability so to do, and upon the further ground of the conviction of defendant of felony in British Columbia, and that his discharge from the confinement in pursuance of said conviction on the 1st day of May, 1890, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made, and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said county of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief described in her complaint.

In witness whereof, I, Wm. B. Hamilton, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand (SEAL) and affix the seal of said Court this 2d day of January, A. D. 1891.

W. B. HAMILTON, Clerk. W. A. GETT, JR., Attorney for Plaintiff. ja3-9t

SUMMONS.

IN THE JUSTICE'S COURT OF WASHINGTON Township, County of Yolo, State of California.—L. U. GILL, plaintiff vs. Albert Wines, defendant. The People of the State of California send greeting to Albert Wines, defendant: You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the Justice's Court of Washington Township, County of Yolo, State of California, and to answer before the Justice, at his office in said township, the complaint filed therein, within five days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons, if served within the township in which this action is brought; or, if served out of said township but in said county, within ten days; or within twenty days if served elsewhere. Said action is brought to recover the sum of $19 95, viz: for board and lodging and for goods sold and delivered at special instance and request of you, the said defendant, as will more fully appear by reference to the complaint on file herein. And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will take judgment against you for the above amount, to wit: $49 95, and costs.

Make legal service and due return hereof. Given under my hand this 2d day of October, 1890. CHAS. A. NEWTON, Justice of the Peace of said Township.

Superstitions.

The sentimental and superstitious who are given to tracing the laws of coincidences will find an interesting subject for their attention in the recent death of a jeweler in Bucyrus, O. For many years it has been the office of a skilful German watchman, named Frank Kehrner, to attend to the town clock. During the past few months the health of Mr. Kehrner has been poor and the clock deprived of his careful attention, has been keeping indifferent time. One Monday morning recently the timepiece struck 5, and a few moments later it stopped. Early risers who heard the chime affirm that there was something indescribably weird and peculiar about it. Later risers, noticing the clock hands pointing to 5:05, commented upon the subject and its aged guardian. Later in the day the news spread that Mr. Kehrner's condition had suddenly become worse and that he had died at 5:05 that morning.

When the late State Senator, B. J. Smith, of Hancock county, W. Va., passed away, his family looked at his watch to see the time. The hands pointed to 12:02. When S. G. Smith, son of the late Senator, began house-keeping in Wheeling, his father gave him a family clock which he had always attended to himself. After the funeral Mr. Smith returned to Wheeling. As soon as he saw the clock Mr. Smith turned to his mother and sister and asked them if anything in the room had attracted their attention. "The clock," said the sister, and the mother nodded assent. The clock had stopped at 12:02.

The Emperor of Germany drank the neatest toast upon record at the marriage of his sister Victoria. It was this: "I stand here in the place of my father, now resting in God, who did not grant that he should live to see this day. May the blessing of our departed father and our beloved mother, and of your parents (turning to the bridegroom) rest upon you. I stand here also as the head of the royal house. You may always rely upon my protection and my paternal friendship. I drink the health of the bridal pair."

The term "blue book" is applied to all papers, reports, documents and the like printed for the Government of Great Britain and laid before the Houses of Parliament, and they are called "blue" because they are stitched up, or bound, in dark-blue paper covers. In Germany and Portugal they would talk of "white books," in France of "yellow," in Italy of "green," and in Spain of "red."

The story is told of a German, who took the hands of his clock to the maker to have them fixed, because they did not keep proper time. Of course, the clock-maker demanded the works, as in them lay the trouble. Boils and blotches, pimples and other eruptions on the exterior tell of a disordered condition of the blood within. If you have these indications, be wise in time, and take Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. It puts the liver and kidneys in good working order, purifies the blood, cleanses the system from all impurities, from whatever cause arising, and tones up the functions generally.

"Golden Medical Discovery" checks the frightful inroads of Scrofula, and, if taken in time, arrests the march of Consumption of the Lungs (which is Lung-scrofula), purifies and enriches the blood, thereby curing all Skin and Scalp Diseases, Ulcers, Sores, Swellings, and kindred ailments. It is powerfully tonic as well as alterative, or blood-cleansing, in its effects, hence it strengthens the system and restores vitality, thereby dispelling all those languid, "tired feelings" experienced by the debilitated. Especially has it manifested its potency in curing Tetters, Salt-rheum, Eczema, Erysipelas, Boils, Carbuncles, Sore Eyes, Goitre, or Thick Neck, and Enlarged Glands.

"Golden Medical Discovery" is the only blood and lung remedy, sold by druggists, and guaranteed by its manufacturers, to do all that it is claimed to accomplish, or money paid for it will be promptly refunded.

An Imperfect Echo.

The colored race are very fond of imitating those who are chivalrous in their bearing and courtly in their manners. Their imitations may not always be very perfect, and are sometimes quite ludicrous, as in the following incident:

During the plantation days a young gentleman, attended by his colored valet, stationed himself one night under the window of his ladylove, and to the light accompaniment of his guitar, sang the following stanza:

"Your bright diamond eyes
And alabaster neck
Strike arrows to my heart—
O Cupid!"

The valet was an attentive listener, and the next evening, to the accompaniment of his banjo, saluted his ladylove with the stanza as he remembered it:

"Your brack di'mond eyes
And yellor plaster neck
Strike horrors to my heart—
O glue pot!"

The dusky belle was offended, and could not be pacified, until Sambo assured her "dat dat verse is de identical verse dat Massa Harry sung to Miss Stella only las' night, and dat's so, fer a fac.—Harper's Magazine.

"When I look at our honored guest," exclaimed the orator of the evening, "and remember how he rose from a humble position to be the President of this vast corporation, I realize forcibly the truth of the saying that there is always room at the top." The President of the vast corporation, a gentleman with a large bald spot on the top of his head, made a memorandum in a little notebook, and the wages of that young orator have never been raised.

J. H. MILLER, Manager & Editor.

We spoke last week of the matter of the appointment of incompetent persons to subordi-nate offices in the public service—appointments brought about by the pressure of political influence. It would seem from our observation that there has been more of it this year than in the past. It is to be regretted that the head of an office, and the one responsible for its conduct, should not be permitted to select for his subordi-nates men of his choice. It is an injustice to the people as well as to the officers. Difficult enough it is for a newly installed officer to get matters in running order, even with experienced assistants, but when hampered with men entirely unacquainted with their duties, and in many cases hopelessly incompetent, the embarrassment becomes extremely serious; the people in the end pay dearly for it. We believe due consid-eration should be had for party service, and know the doctrine "to the victors belong the spoils," will be observed so long as political parties will exist. The trouble, however, has been and is that quite many of the rewarded victors know more of politics than of official duty; if consideration were paid to competency as well as partizanship, all would be well. The legisla-tion that has been had tending to a reform of the civil service has accomplished much for good, and in some of the Eastern States has brought about, in large de-gree, a correction of evils. But much more is needed; particularly is it needed in California. At the present session of the Legislature action on this matter should be taken, and the member who will draft a bill that will be reasonably operative, and procure its passage, will have well repaid the people for his election. We have a Governor who entered his office unfettered, and from the sentiments he expressed in his addresses dur-ing the campaign we are assured that he is in full accord with the legislation that has been had in some other States on this subject. Recently the New York Tribune contained an article on the changes in official life at the close of last year, that occurred in Kings county and the city of Brooklyn, and it exhibits a striking contrast with what transpired here. The changes there were fewer than in former years. Since 1783, when the office of Sheriff of Kings county was consti-tuted, until now, there have been sixty Sheriffs, who served terms ranging from one to thirteen years, but most of them not longer than three years, the law for the last half century not permitting a reelection to that office, and the term is limited to three years. Sacra-mento county was organized February 18, 1850, and the first election took place April 1, 1850. We have had twenty Sheriffs since our organization, one of whom held the office by appointment to fill the vacancy occa-sioned by the killing of his predecessor, Mr. McKin-ney, in the squatter riots. Our Sheriffs, in all instances save one, served but one term of two years; in the ex-cepted case of Mr. Drew, he was elected three times and filled the office six years. The same showing would perhaps obtain with relation to the other county officers. Parenthetically we remark, as a matter of cu-riosity, that since the first State election in 1849, Cali-fornia has had eighteen Governors, fourteen of whom were elected, and four succeeded from the Lieutenant Governorship by reason of resignations and death of the elected executives, and but in one instance—that of Mr. Bigler—has there been a reelection. For changes effected by the people at elections there can of course be no criticism, but for those in subordinate offices—where men are displaced for political reasons only, there is little to excuse in very many instances. We quote from the Tribune article, and the first para-graph should furnish food for solid thought to the Re-publicans of Sacramento, in view of the approaching city election:

The conference of leading Republicans at the house of ex-Park Commissioner Kennedy, in Brooklyn, last week tended to clear the air and bring about a unity of feeling in the matter of steering a wise course the coming year, and avoid-ing the rocks upon which the party was so badly wrecked the last year. Mr. Kennedy naturally was subject to some adverse criticism for his action in taking the initiative in the matter, but some one had to make the first move. His aim was simply to secure an interchange of views and see if a common basis of action could not be agreed upon. A caucus of all the delegates to the General Committee will probably be held early in January. The reelection of E. B. Cadley to the responsible office of Clerk of the Board of Supervisors, secures the retention of his valuable services, which are well worth the $4,000 they annually cost the county. Mr. Cadley has had more than twenty years of experience in the office he now holds, and he is thoroughly familiar with the history of county legislation. He prevents many legal snarls by foreseeing how measures as proposed will conflict with pre-vious enactments, and by having the resolutions modified to fit the facts. It is probable that Judah B. Voorhees, who for more than a third of a century was chief clerk in the Surro-gate's office, and whose knowledge of the last wills and tes-taments of the men who died in the city and county sur-passes that of all others, will retire from his office with the close of the year. He has had more or less trouble with his eyes for some time, and this, with other infirmities of age, leads him favorably to consider the question of retiring. Mr. Voorhees was born in 1828, and he was made Clerk of the County Court in 1845, and in 1854, Clerk to the Surro-gate. He has been Deputy Surrogate for several years.

Mr. Voorhees would hardly have had that experi-ence in California, and it is not at all likely he would have been required to retire from an important office, for which he was peculiarly qualified, by reason of fail-ing eyesight. Were he in San Francisco, doubtless he would have been able to have maintained his place, not, however, through his qualifications, or the re-sponsibility of the work of his position.

The illness of Senator Hearst has created serious apprehension. Though a man of limited early educa-tion, his life career has been marked by unusual success. He was born in Franklin county, Missouri, September 3, 1820, and his parents were of Scotch descent. His father, a native of North Carolina, set-tled in Missouri in 1808. At the age of twenty-two young Hearst engaged in lead and copper mining in his native State, and in March, 1850, started for Cali-fornia, and arrived overland at Placerville in October. There he remained and engaged in mining until 1852, when he located in Sacramento, and embarked in gen-eral merchandizing for a short time. The city directory of 1853 contains these entries: "Hearst & Co., wholesale merchants, 92 K. Hearst, George, of Hearst & Co., 92 K; Missouri." At that time Sena-tor Stanford was in the same line of business at 56 and 58 K, near Third. Milton S. Latham, who after-wards was in the United States Senate, was at the same time practising law and officing in the Tehama block. Senator Newton Booth was with Booth & Co., whole-sale merchants, at 38 K. Senator Cornelius Cole was an attorney at law, officing at 52 K, and his dwelling is described as "in alley, between O and P, and Front and Second." Since leaving Sacramento, Senator Hearst has engaged principally in mining. In 1865 he was elected to the State Assembly; on March 23, 1886, he was appointed United States Senator by Governor Stoneman to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of General Miller, but at the extra session of the Legislature—a Republican body—on August 4, 1886, A. P. Williams was elected to the place. However, on January 19, 1887, Mr. Hearst was elected for the full term. Of those who have represented Califor-nia in the upper house of Congress—eighteen in number—twelve are now dead: John C. Fremont, William M. Gwin, John B. Weller, David C. Broderick, Henry P. Haun, Milton S. Latham, James A. McDougall, Eugene Casserly, Aaron A. Sargent, John S. Hager, James T. Farley and John F. Miller. Of them, Broderick and Miller died in office. Those living are: John Conness, Cornelius Cole, Newton Booth, A. P. Williams, Leland Stanford and George Hearst. Senator Hearst's term will expire March 4th, 1893. It is unnecessary to comment much upon the re-election of Mr. Stanford to the United States Senate. He was practically re-elected on November 4th by the people, and the action of the joint legislative convention was but a necessary formality. It has been charged that past elections of federal Senators in this State have been very generally controlled by money; in some instances it must be conceded that has been the case. The taint cannot attach in this instance. The Legislature but voiced the will of the people; the character of the Senator is known from his record, extending back in political life since 1856, and in business life in this State, since the early fifties.

A noted artist has drawn upon canvas a noble and majestic stag wounded unto death, stretched upon the plain. Above and around are seen the birds of car-riion circling nearer and nearer, impatiently waiting for their contemplated feast. When the rumor came that United States Senator, George Hearst had passed away, the action of those libels on mankind, those harpies—carriion buzzards—who fatten on political plunder, were eagerly calculating upon what they could gain through the election of his successor. It was not with them, "who is the ablest and fittest man, but who will give most for the prize?" Nor was this great interest confined to the manipulating harpies, but men in high station were whispering the sirenic songs, which had the ring of gold, to secure this exalted post of honor. Verily the great sheltering tree of politics has beneath its spreading branches many unclean things, and the modern system of selecting our United States Senators in many instances is the outgrowth of this impurity. We hope, with all well-thinking citizens, that Senator Hearst may recover and be in the future what he has been in the past—a noble and useful man.

Hon. Elwood Bruner, of Sacramento, has been se-lected as Chairman of the House Judiciary Committee. No better choice could have been made. He is an experienced legislator, and sound constitutional law-yer. Being familiar with the wants of the people, and the needed amendments to the Codes, he is the right man in the right place. There will necessarily come before this Legislature many important meas-ures, and we feel assured that Mr. Bruner is equal to all emergencies. His wide experience as a public prosecutor fits him as a proper adviser in any changes in the criminal procedure. As an experienced legisla-tor, he is adapted for any changes in the general laws of this State, so as to have the same in proper shape. There is a promise of some radical changes in our school book arrangement—not in the system—and Mr. Bruner's experience as an educator particularly fits him for this business. He knows there is no fault in the system, but is aware of the defects in the compilation. The school book ring which seeks to abrogate our valuable system, will find a bitter and able opponent in the Chairman of the Judiciary Committee. His knowledge of the wants of the people will enable him to render valuable service in securing a proper regard for the careful compilation and composition, in a literary sense, of the State school books. THEMIS has always criticised the literary work on our school books, but never found fault with the workmanship or the system. We feel assured of careful legislation on this, and all other subjects where experience and good judgment are required, as long as Hon. Elwood Bruner can have a say on the subject. Speaker Coombs has shown good judgment in all his committee selections. There is great promise of the present Legislature. Rings of all descriptions seem to have been relegated to the very dark back ground.

From the American Banker we gather the outline of a commercial expedient relating to the establishment of international banks. Some time ago Secretary Blaine recommended an International Monetary Union, based upon the action of the Pan-American Conference. This Union was to meet at Washington this month, and it would likely deal also with the question of international banks. "Among the judicious commercial expedients which Congress is invited to consider is the international bank, respecting which the President transmitted a favorable report to Congress from the international convention. There is a growing belief among the mercantile and banking interests that Mr. Blaine's plan for establishing an international bank is not only well adapted to benefit our southern neighbors, but is easily capable of receiving such amendments as would make it a valuable outwork to our financial system, as well as an active aid to that commercial independence and sound expansion which is becoming more necessary every year to our foreign commerce, and to other functions of our national life. Such a bank, if well managed, would tend to attract into our commercial fields of enterprise a growing aggregate of European capital, and would facilitate our money exchanges with certain countries, besides diminishing the energy of some of the forces that tend to increase the danger of gold exports in a sensitive condition of the money market and of the foreign exchanges. The President suggests that among the powers granted to such a bank, none should be allowed but such as are strictly necessary to accomplish the objects primarily in view—namely, the convenient foreign exchanges. Hence, the privilege of opening branch banks should be restricted, and the powers of trust, guaranty, and safe deposit companies should be omitted."

There are people who have one idea which they manage to utilize in very many ways—just as a poet frames a fragile idea to fit a dozen metres. Such men have no conception of the beautiful, either in nature or art. One-idea men are of short conscience and look only to their selfish desires, ignoring the trinity of truth, goodness and beauty. Truth and goodness are not complete until beauty is added to the trinity. Our Puritan fathers sought, and their followers of this day seek to elevate mankind by making everything ugly—beauty found no favor; it is an evil. The man that cannot bring beauty to his mind and soul, is scarcely worthy of the name. It was the design of the Creator that we should love the beautiful. Woman was made beautiful after this design of creation. When we see men endowed with this cynical, not to say Puritanical notion, that the beautiful is evil, the conclusion uppermost in our minds is, that such men are lacking in mental strength, and not of the design of our Creator. It is one of the greatest pleasures of a refined life to admire a beautiful picture, or any work of art, as well as the beauties of nature. There is no more pleasing sight than that of an assemblage of beautifully attired ladies, such as appeared at the recent great social event at the Capitol. The man who could not be inspired by such splendor, is, indeed, fit for treason and spoils. Such pure art adorns virtue in our sisters, and makes them adorable, as was intended by the Ruler of the Universe. Man was framed for delight in this loveliness, even though a combination of nature and art.

Story of the War.—Lincoln's Faith.

General James A. Rusling, in an address delivered at Trenton, N. J., recently told a new and interesting story of the civil war which has never been printed. The anecdote illustrates Abraham Lincoln's faith in the efficacy of prayer, and constitutes an important incident in the struggle of the Union forces.

It was at the second day's fight at Gettysburg, during which General Daniel E. Sickles lost a leg. The limb was amputated above the knee, and within the next few days the wounded officer was conveyed to Washington, and made as comfortable as possible in a dwelling house on F street, opposite the Ebbitt House.

General Rusling, who knew Sickles well, called to see him. While there, President Lincoln was announced, and was shown into the room. The three gentlemen fell into conversation about the battle. Sickles asked the President whether he had not been greatly worried as to the result of that memorable fight.

"Oh, no," said Lincoln, "I thought it would be all right."

"But you must have been about the only man who felt so," replied Sickles. "I understood that there was a deep feeling of anxiety here among the heads of the Government."

"Yes," replied Lincoln. "Stanton, Wells, and the rest were pretty badly scared and ordered two or three gunboats up to the city, placed some of the Government archives aboard, and wanted me to get aboard, too, but I told them it wasn't necessary; that it would be all right."

"But what made you feel so confident, Mr. President," persisted General Sickles.

"Oh, I had my reasons, but I don't care to mention them. They would, perhaps, be laughed at," said Lincoln.

Of course the curiosity of both the other gentlemen was greatly excited, and Sickles again pressed the President to explain the grounds of his confidence. Finally Mr. Lincoln, drawing a deep breath, and stretching himself up to his full length said:

"Well, I will tell you why I felt so confident. Before the battle I retired alone to my room, got down on my knees and prayed to Almighty God to give us the victory. I said to Him that this was his war, and that if He would stand by the nation now, I would stand by Him the rest of my life. He gave us the victory, and I propose to keep my pledge. I arose from my knees with a feeling of deep and serene confidence, and had no doubt of the result from that hour."

Generals Sickles and Rusling were both profoundly impressed by President Lincoln's words, and for some minutes complete silence reigned. Then Sickles turning over on his couch, said:

"Well, Mr. President, how do you feel about the Vicksburg campaign?"

"Oh, I think that will be all right, too. Grant is pegging away at the enemy, and I have great confidence in him. I like Grant. He doesn't bother me or give me any trouble. I prayed for success here, too. I told the Lord all about this Vicksburg campaign, that victory here would cut the Confederacy in two, and would be decisive of the war. I have faith that we shall come out all right at Vicksburg. If Grant wins here I shall stick to him through the war."

This conversation, General Rusling said, took place on the 5th of July. Vicksburg had been captured by Grant the day before, on the 4th, but the news had not yet reached Washington.

General Sickles confirmed the story when seen at his Fifth avenue residence recently, and added that Lincoln was a profoundly devout man.—N. Y. Star.

Mermaids and Mermen.

The dugong, a species of whale found abundantly in the waters of both the great oceans, but especially off the coast of Australia in the Pacific, is believed to have furnished the slender basis upon which all mermaids and mermen stories have been founded. Its average length is from 8 to 20 feet. It has a head much resembling that of the human species, and breathes by means of lungs. It feeds upon submarine beds of sea-weeds, and when wounded makes a noise like a mad bull. Long hair in the female species, and hair and beard in the male, adds to the human resemblance of the head and neck. The flesh of this species of whale is used for food, and is said to have the flavor of bacon, mutton or beef, according to the parts of the body from which the meat is taken.

When we are well we all make fun of the doctor, but when we are sick, find that "there's healing in the creak of his shoes as he comes up the stairs."

Patient—"Isn't there some mistake about that bill you sent me?" Doctor—"No, sir; it's correct, five hundred dollars." Patient—"To pay that will take every cent I have; I'll starve." Doctor—"Well, dieting is what you need."

Liberal Faith.

We believe that the inspiration of hope and love is far more efficacious to promote righteousness than the deterrent power of law and penalty. We believe that the world is to be saved by hope, not by fear; that love is the only true obedience, and that love begets love. We carry this faith out consistently in the family and the state as well as in our theology. We believe that the best place for the rod is in the fire, not on the mantel; and that in the home where hope broods, purity and love are nestled. We believe that all prisons should be penitentiaries, all punishments reformatory; and that to every criminal entering a prison, hope should show an open door to liberty through repentance and reformation. Our penology and theology are in spirit identical. We believe that God is love; that love expresses the sum of all his moral attributes; that justice is love working out the good of the all, that mercy is love working out the good of the one; that, however, these seem to conflict in human governments, they are consistent and co-operative in God's government, that his mercy endureth forever; that his government is a government of mercy; that all his laws are framed and administered for healing and redemption. We do not believe that he does all things "for his own glory." The glory of the mother is her love; but she does not love for her own glory; could not love for her own glory; for self-seeking is not and never can be love. We believe that God loves because God is God; and if we could conceive Him as ceasing to love we should cease to worship Him; for what we worship is not His power, nor His wisdom, but the love that directs them both. We believe in man, in man as the child of God; in man as made in God's image and of kin to Him. We believe, with Bushnell, that depravity is not [natural, but against nature. Sin is an overlay; a foreign element; a disease; a morbid growth. We believe, with our critics, that humanity is lost; but we turn to the fifteenth chapter of Luke to find out what Christ meant by lost; for we mean what he meant. And he meant by lost not yet found. The lost coin is still gold with the image of the king upon it; the lost sheep, a sheep still, no wolf; the lost son has still the blood of the father in his veins. We believe in evolution; we believe in redemption; science gives us the one spelling, religion the other. Redemption is God's evolution of a perfect manhood out of very imperfect material. We rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory to be in His hands and become His workmanship. Our message is Christ's message to Zaccheus; to the paralytic; to the woman that was a sinner. It is the medicine of hope for the disease of despair.—Christian Union (Evangelical).

Odin's Furious Host.

Valhalla is the great hall in which Odin feasts with the heroes who have fallen in battle, and when seated on his throne Odin overlooks heaven and earth. His "furious host" is the storm-wind howling through the air, and he takes special delight when they rush in a great gale over mountains and valleys, leading on the Pitris. These live in the sky with Zema, and sometimes shine as bright stars, who busy themselves with the direction of the weather. Odin has dominion over both air and water, walking on the waves and commanding the gale. In olden times he would wander round in a wagon drawn by two wolves. The appearance of these are a portent of death, and when he comes he rushes over the tree-tops, accompanied by a host of dead men's spirits. This recalls Erckman Chatrian's thrilling story of the wild huntsman, Vittiakab, who sped through the forest one stormy night, carrying away the soul of a young girl. As the fearful monster was heard speeding by the windows and over the house-tops, the inmates trembled, "for none knew but his own soul might be required of him."

In Odenwald it is believed that the passing of the Wild Huntsman is the sign of the approach of war, and it is related that the sound of phantom horses and hounds were heard rushing through the air by the Duke of Baden before the commencement of the last war in Germany.

A poem has been written about the rash keeper of the royal forest named Falkenberg, who dared to hunt on the Sabbath. During the chase he was joined by two huntsmen; one tried to persuade him to return home, the other led him on. At last from amid the stormy clouds a voice of thunder was heard, saying:

Be chased forever through the woods,
Forever roam the affrighted wild.

Helplessly the Wildgrave was whirled through the air, and this dreadful chase, according to the legend, goes on still and will last forever. Behind him follow the hounds and horses, and when the belated peasants hear these sounds in the passing storm they devoutly cross themselves and hasten home.

The Chief-Justice of Georgia has decided that "some of the virtues are in the nature of moral luxuries," as contradistinguished from necessities. That accounts for the self-denial of many economical persons in so rarely indulging in them.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

Reilly an' the foo is going to do wonders for Edward Harrigan in his new theater.

An enterprising Chicagoan is said to have offered Tennyson $1,000 to write a comic opera.

When I was young I wrote a tragedy.

A great success the critics all did vote it.

In confidence my friend remarked to me,

"It was immense, my boy, but—ah—who wrote it?"

Sol Smith Russell is the only star on the road who does not employ an advance agent, and yet he finds that A Poor Relation draws large audiences without the preliminary work of that official.

A new play, never before presented on the American stage, has been put into rehearsal by the stock company of the American Academy of the Dramatic Arts, in which the company will make its New York debut.

Noah's Ark, the new play which is to follow the season of the pantomime of Babes in the Wood, at Niblo's, late in February, is not at all descriptive of the days of the flood, but deals with life in the big city. Noah, in this case, being a pawn-broker, and the "Ark" the title by which his loan bureau is known.

Of 3,000 light-hearted, sanguine bands of players who set out for fame and fortune at the beginning of the present season, 718 survive. The others have fallen by the wayside. Here is the assortment of lucky companies still on the road: 2 pantomime troupes, 22 opera companies, 18 presenting standard tragedies, 190 presenting society plays, 65 presenting melodrama, 213 presenting farce comedies, 18 minstrel bands, 35 variety organizations, 23 magicians, 6 horse shows, 3 companies of educated animals, 100 comedia drama organizations.

When the Sturtevant House caught fire from the blazes which swept across from the burning Fifth Avenue Theater, during the disastrous conflagration in New York on the night of January 2d, the corridors of the hotel quickly filled with smoke. E. G. Gilmore, owner of Niblo's Garden, and part owner and manager of the Academy, was in one of the rooms on the top floor arranging with other theatrical magnates for next season's tour of A High Roller. Rushing pell mell down stairs at the first alarm of fire, the party stumbled over the kneeling form of a woman. Clasp ing the Niblo's manager about the limbs, the woman sobbed, "Let me pray!" Quickly lifting the frightened female to her feet, and dragging her rapidly earthwards after his fleeing companions, Manager Gilmore phlegmatically ejaculated, "No, let us run."

Rose Coghlan's new play, Lady Barter, is reported to be a great success. The story deals with a few striking episodes in the life of a coquettish woman of the adventuress type. Nellie Marshall, a country girl, has had an intrigue with Hugh Charlton, son of a Baronet, who is subsequently sent on military service to Egypt and killed. On his deathbed he wills all his possessions to Nellie. She had, however, drifted to London and meets Sir Henry Barter, whom she marries and whose death follows closely on the nuptials. The widow makes a second conquest in the person of Lord Brent, who is young, rich and handsome. Col. Pierce, a friend of Hugh Charlton, comes to England to find Nellie and acquaint her with the terms of the will, and is amazed to find her in Lady Barter and engaged to Lord Brent, also a dear friend of his. He taxes her with the shady episode in her past history, but she denies everything, refuses to give up Lord Brent, and defies him to do his worst. He accepts the challenge and finally succeeds in freeing Lord Brent from his entanglement. Lady Barter is presented by the author as a shrewd, fascinating, heartless woman. Her dialogue sparkles with epigrammatic cynicism.

Col. Jack Haverly, at various times of New York, California, and Mexico, and once the richest and most powerful of all minstrel men and theatrical managers, has been in the city for several days. Last night Col. Haverly attended the performance at the Buckingham Theater and sat in the front row. His head is as bald as that of any man who ever sat in those seats. Col. Haverly was much taken with Lizzie Raymond, the handsome serio-comic, who set the house wild with her song, "It Used to be the Caper, but it Don't Go Now." The appearance of the vaudeville favorite attracted the colonel's attention and he became restless. When she sung the refrain the ex-minstrel king was carried away. He stood up in his seat, and, running his hand down in his trousers pocket, pulled out a handful of silver coin. He swung his hands aloft and showered the singer and the stage with money. It fell on all sides and dazed the star. Silver dollars, halves, and quarters rolled around and into the footlights. Some excitement was caused. It might have gone in Mexico or on the slope, but it didn't go here, and in a jiffy watchman Mahar's club was rapping and he was at Haverly's side and would have put him out if the minstrel man's identity had not been made known to him.—Louisville Courier-Journal.

Book Chat.

Jules Verne is now a handsome man of sixty, with head and beard quite gray, and with eyes which sparkle with all the fire of twenty.

It was to Xenophon that the immortal Socrates said: "O pupil of mine, the potentiality of acquiring happiness is within the comprehension of all; it has only to be comprehended." This consoling philosophic truth has been admirably preserved in an epigram made by Protoxarnes the Less:

"Contentment's always on the tapis

For every well conducted man,

For if a person can't be happy

He should be happy as he can."

Diogenes was a man who lived very many years ago in Athens. He seems to have been the agent for a certain lantern or other illuminating machine which he sought to introduce among his fellow townsmen. But, of course, you know all about that. It was this Diogenes who wrote or caused to be written an epigram, which, done into our own tongue, runs in this wise:

"I'd not bepraise the meagre herd

To whom rewards are meted,

But fain would speak a cheering word

Unto the host defeated.

The "Devil's Book" was the name bestowed upon playing-cards by the Puritans of old. There have been several books or treatises on playing-cards, written by learned men, among them being Paul la Croix's Les Carles à Jouer, Chatto's Facts and Speculations about Playing-cards and Two Histories of Playing-cards, written respectively by the Rev. Edward Taylor and Mr. Singer. But these books are out of print, and somewhat difficult to obtain.

Forty large plates, representing more than eighty of the most interesting relics of the Stuarts, will form the volume which Macmillan is bringing out, under the title of the "Royal House of Stuart." Among the belongings of Mary, Queen of Scots, therein pictured, are a handbill, a prayer-book, a gold rosary and crucifix, a diamond ring and a bloodstone cameo. Then there are sketches of the one of the two shirts worn by King Charles at his execution, of a pistol carried by the Pretender, and of numerous Jacobite relics.

The "Epicurian" is a classical story by Thomas Moore. The plot of this story is laid chiefly in Egypt, whither the hero, the head of the Athenian school, went in search of immortality. While seeking this boon he is allured by apparitions and the arts of necromancy into an order of priesthood. Before completing the initiatory rites he escapes with a disaffected priestess. After a long flight they join a Christian anchorite and become converts to his faith. The chief priest, chagrined at the loss of his distinguished neophyte, persecutes all Christians, far and near, and finally causes the death of the priestess and her Grecian lover. This story is made interesting by the descriptions of Egyptian life and priesthood.

Professional Chat.

"I understood you to say that your charge for service would be light," complained the client, when the solicitor handed him a big bill. "I believe I did say my fee would be nominal," was the lawyer's reply, "but ——" "Oh, I see," hastily interrupted the client, "you meant phenomenal."

The jolly jokers, who are always ringing the changes in matters humorous, direct attention to the fact that the Supreme Court now has two colors, a Gray and a Brown. Some years since the Chief-Justice was Taney. It has had one Miller, and now boasts of a Brewer. It has had two Chases, Samuel and Salmon P., but only one scion of the Smith family ever reached that distinction—William Smith, of Alabama, who declined the honor, and was succeeded by John McKinley, of the same State, who, by the by, was no relation to William McKinley, otherwise known as "McKinley Bill." The Court also had a Barbour, Phillip P., of Virginia, and likewise a Story, the distinguished Joseph, of Massachusetts. There was also a Campbell on the Supreme woollack, who succeeded Justice McKinley.

Mr. Gough, who addressed in his lifetime about seven thousand audiences, used to say that he never went upon a platform without a feeling of trepidation, and I have myself heard Gen. B. F. Butler say that, on rising to speak, he is always conscious of a weakness at the knees. Some of the oldest actors and the most successful are not free from this infirmity. Nor can it be truly said that coolness of nerve is a result of sound health. During the last thirty-five years of Andrew Jackson's life he never enjoyed one day of good health. But no one ever saw him fretted or anxious—not in moments of the most critical importance to his plans and hopes. He once declared himself that he never knew what it was to be excited or fearful of failure, and we know that on the morning of the battle of New Orleans he slept peacefully on his lounge as long as the circumstances permitted, and showed perfect calm at every moment until the day was decided. Yet he was more fit for the hospital on that day than in the field.

The death of Baron Huddleston, of the English High Court of Justice, recalls the incident noted a few months ago of his charging a grand jury while he was lying on a sick bed, the grand jurors having been summoned to his bedside. He had been a judge for fifteen years, serving first on the Common Pleas bench. He was nearly seventy-five years old, and for several years had suffered from a painful disease, which, perhaps, affected his temper. His indomitable will and great energy as well as his power of mind made their impress upon the judicial history of the English Courts. "Pump Court," a London law paper, speaks too strongly, probably, when it gives as the general opinion at the bar that "his ill-temper, roughness and overbearing conduct reached such a pitch of late years as to be well-nigh intolerable." His ill-health and strict sense of duty probably had something to do with the conduct which was occasionally criticised. On account of a change in the Courts, Baron Huddleston's successor will not have the title of nobility. He is Robert Samuel Wright, who has been a practising lawyer for twenty-five years.

Judge Brown, the new Supreme Judge, has killed his man, though he is neither a duelist nor a murderer, writes a New York Commercial correspondent. He was aroused from his sleep one night by a noise in his room. Standing near his bed he saw a man with his face masked, a pistol in one hand and a dark lantern in the other. In a very polite manner the Judge asked the visitor what he wanted at that hour of the night, to which the man replied that he wanted all the money and valuables of any sort that might be about the house. He even went so far as to inform the Judge that he was a burglar. He said further that if the Judge did not assist him by keeping very quiet and pointing out the valuables, the Judge might have his learned brains blown out. It was not a comfortable situation, but Mr. Brown made the best of it, carrying on a gentle conversation with the burglar. Having got everything of value he could find, the man was about to leave the room, when his attention was attracted by a gold pin on the dressing case which he had not seen before. Made bold by the manner of the Judge, he thoughtlessly turned his back to the bed, and in a flash the Judge had a pistol out a drawer by his bedside and blazed away at the burglar. With a cry of pain he rushed from the room, followed by the Judge. In the landing at the foot of the stairs the burglar took a stand and began returning the fire. Face to face the two men fired at each other until their revolvers were empty. Then the burglar escaped. The noise brought in the police and neighbors. They found the Judge unharmed, but there were spots of blood on the floor, indicating that the burglar had been hit. Later the man was captured and he was so badly wounded that he lived but a short time. This story is told by one of the Michigan Senators.

Three of the candidates for the Speakership of the next House, says the Washington Post, were joking together a day or two ago over the enterprise of a Washington correspondent who had undertaken to name the Speaker and the chairmen of the prominent committees of the next House. "There's many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip," said candidate No. 1. "I should say so," said candidate Number 2. "Out in my State there were two contestants for the position of doorkeeper of the Legislature. In their canvass of the State they met and compared notes. Each had pledged enough to elect him. 'What is the use,' said one, 'of wasting more time and money? One of us is sure to be elected. Let us go home, and we will agree that whoever is chosen will appoint the other his first assistant.' They agreed, and went home. When the Legislature met, neither man got a vote?" Great laughter. "There was a politician in my town," said candidate No. 3, "who was an applicant for the county clerkship. When I asked him how he was progressing he showed me a book in which he had the names of 1,700 men who had said they would vote for him. On election day that man received just 123 votes. He told me afterwards that there were 1577 liars in that town, and he could prove it." More laughter. "I can discount your stories," said candidate No. 1, who had been listening attentively to these recitals. "In my town a man announced himself as a candidate for Sheriff. When he went home and told his wife what he had done she positively refused to agree to live in the tumble-down dwelling adjoining the county jail, which was the Sheriff's residence. Nothing daunted, the candidate drove out six or seven miles to the jail the following day with his wife, and the inspection of the place simply confirmed the lady in her position. They quarrelled then and there, and the husband and wife actually separated. In the convention the husband received only 17 votes and was the last man in the race." "What became of the wife?" asked the interested auditors. "Oh, she came back to her husband," was the reply, "and has had her own way with him ever since."

NOTES.

In cold weather physicians advise us to keep our mouths closed. This advice would be good for some people in warm weather also.

The Marysville Daily Appeal has entered upon its sixty-third volume. No paper in the State is more ably edited, and it wields a power in Northern California.

When Al. Johnston was at his old business he was very glad to deliver bills, but in his new calling the delivery of bills is not such an easy and pleasing task.

Venice has 140,000 inhabitants. Of these no less than 40,000 are enrolled as recipients of relief; that is to say, nearly one-fourth of the population are paupers.

It is said that short rations and hunger have something to do with the uprising of the Indians, as well as the Messiah craze. Either short rations or religious fanaticism would do it.

A New York servant girl imagined herself an angel and tried to fly. We have known of servant girls to fly. The occasion of the flight was the mistress' discovering "hubby" kissing them.

There are five women and one man in Toronto, it is said, who sleep every night in their respective coffins. Doubtless, it would be gratifying to that community if the sleeping would be their last. But the fools are not all dead, unfortunately.

The recent Italian elections returned nine Jewish members of the Chamber of Deputies. This is the largest number of that faith who ever sat in an Italian Parliament. The crusade against the "faithful" seems to have caused a reaction in their favor.

The original ordinance of secession of South Carolina has a prominent place in the office of the Secretary of that State, and is next to the Declaration of Independence. This shows how our Southern brethren revere their traditions of the late "unpleasantness."

Gladstone is another among the list of hale old men who have passed their four-score years and are still young. He has outlived two generations and is still as good as the best of them. There is none like him among all the diplomats and statesmen of Europe or America.

Great care is taken of the morals of the youthful Helgolanders. No young person under 16 is permitted to enter a public house, dancing room or theater. The law has been in force about a quarter of a century, and the Germans, while making various new regulations, have not altered it.

King Kalakaua has been sat down upon by the Board of City Trustees—and rightfully. The Trustees, in the first place, have no legal right to expend the money of the city for such a purpose; in the second place, it might be the dusky monarch, were he to come here, would be abundantly entertained by King Faro.

For genuine fun and boyish hilarity that will—if one may coin a word—out-boy the boys, there is nothing like the staid married people who have practically given up dancing, and take it up again only on some special occasion. Their enjoyment seems to put in the shade that of the younger members of the company.

Nellie Grant's husband is said to be dying some place in France, his ailment being what old Californians call, "snakes in his boots." That was an unfortunate choice for our Nellie. Indeed, it is rare that any American girl ever has a happy lot with titled foreigners. Uncle Sam's girls would do better to select their life partners from Brother Jonathan's boys.

A prominent State official has a precocious five-year-old who is evidently a chip of the old block. A few evenings since, while at dinner, the youngster, sitting in his high chair, insisted on kicking the table with his feet. His father admonished him to quit. The offending offspring replied, "Oh, papa, let me kick; I can work my jaws better when I kick." Objections ceased amid suppressed laughter behind the napkin.

The last issue of the Colfax Sentinel had the following: Last week Waterman pardoned Frank C. Faily, convicted of murder in the first degree in Auburn in 1885, and sentenced to life imprisonment. He murdered in cold blood Jasper Goodwin, a respectable citizen of the county, in a saloon at Lincoln. Waterman has freed many hard cases during the past few weeks, but in no instance did he make a worse blunder than when he pardoned Frank C. Faily. He is a desperate man when under the influence of liquor and always carries a revolver.

Some men are so eagerly anticipatory that they get to wondering how they shall celebrate their silver wedding before they have been married a week.

The Monache Tidings gives this notice to reformers: "In Australia they have the Australian ballot, Government railroads, telegraph, express (parcel delivery), savings banks, water works and eight hours a day's work. Still thousands are out of employment and wealth runs riot beside impatient poverty."

Another suicide has startled Monte Carlo. There have lately been quite a number of these tragic sequels to tales of ruin traced to the well known gaming tables. A week ago it was the Baron von Isny, a Bavarian nobleman, who, finding himself bankrupt, ended his life with morphine. Now it is a Russian of wealth, who staked all and lost.

The Alla says: The new crop of Colonels is coming up in this State. Every change in the State administration brings the Colonel crop up, regardless of drought or deluge. The veterans who have heroically drank in defense of the State reflect sympathetic feelings upon the arduous campaign which awaits the pneumogastic nerve of the new recruits.

Women all over the United States should hold the memory of Francis E. Spinner in respect and gratitude. He was the first person who, in the face of much opposition, gave women a place in the Government service, employing them in the Treasury Department. At the present time there are about 5,000 women employed in the departments at Washington.

A simple and novel treatment for the cure of dyspepsia and cancer of the stomach has lately been practiced by many prominent physicians. This consists in washing out the stomach. A long flexible pipe is passed down the throat until one end is in the stomach. The upper end has a funnel attached, into which hot water is poured until the stomach is filled. The funnel end of the pipe is then turned down until it is lower than the bottom of the stomach, which is thus emptied as through a siphon. The hot water closes the blood vessels and reduces inflammation, and the relief is immediate.

Our codes and statutes need revising badly. There are so many amendments and laws changing the effect of the codes, that some competent and learned lawyers should be appointed to thoroughly go over all the enactments and report the conflicting and inconsistent provisions for repeal or modifications. There are many useless, as well as unobserved laws on our statute books that should be abrogated. The volume of amendments to the codes has almost obliterated all traces of the original. The present Legislature would perform a master stroke of policy if this subject should receive attention looking towards the consummation of the object named.

We wonder if this Legislature will maintain the reputation and follow in the footsteps of its predecessor. The rule has been for the press, at the beginning of the session, to denigrate the assembled representatives as the most intelligent body that ever assembled in the State. After a while, when things begin to move along merrily, comes the intimation that that shadowy hand of corruption is discernible. Then come the open charges of venality. At the adjournment there is the newspaperial sigh of relief that the people are no longer in danger; that they can pay the bills and hope for better results the next time. However, the evil seems to be a necessity.

There are circumstances under which a man is justified in lying. A few days ago a lady called at the office of the Superintendent of State Printing, and inquired of the bookkeeper, who was alone in the office, "Is Mr. Johnston in?" The bookkeeper, supposing naturally it was a matter where there would be another numerous intercessions for positions in the State bindery, and as his principal was busily engaged in arranging for the transfer of the office and its property from Captain Young, and was not in a position to be disturbed, he replied; "No, Madam, Mr. Johnston is in San Francisco." "Well," replied the lady, "should he return from San Francisco in the next half hour, tell him his wife called here to see him. It is rather a good joke on the wife and the bookkeeper, the latter of course not being acquainted with her.

It is amusing, the confiding manner in which a woman tells you about the perfections of her husband and the imperfections of other men, says the Chicago Herald. She will seat herself in the center of a group of acquaintances and go into rhapsodies over the noble qualities of the man she has married. She sings his praises as if he was a perfect stranger to the rest of them. They listen and hide their smiles and think how little she knows her own husband and how they could astonish her if they told her half of what their own model husbands had told them about him. They congratulate themselves on their own happiness and are sorry that she is so ignorant of the true character of the man she extols. She knows that not one of them can say much in praise of their own husbands, and thinks with a feminine thrill of triumph how they must envy her. Sometimes she goes on to the end, believing her husband to be entirely different from the rest of the wicked sex. She is willing to be deceived and to deceive herself for the sake of having the requirements of her theoretical idea met. She in her eulogizing becomes the laughing stock of her acquaintances, but she finds genuine happiness in believing her husband to be just what her fancy paints.

The misfortune of holding subordinate political position, position dependent on the appointive power of some elective official, to which a certain, unerring monthly salary is attached, with short hours of labor or employment, was never more emphatically illustrated than in the beginning of this year, when an entirely new administration assumed the reins of government, and the incumbents of four and eight years' duration retired. With the State officers their subordinates in all the varied branches of the State service, of high and low degree, of course also took their departure. The chiefs and heads left with the consoling reflection that they had all made friends and leave not an enemy, for they were good servants of the people, having discharged the duties devolving on them without a blemish attaching to their career. So with all truth must it be said of the clerks, the laborers and all the attaches. But it is of the latter of whom we speak, and while doing so we confess to a degree of sadness as we reflect that many of them, those without trades or skilled accomplishments that might command immediate employment, must find it hard to secure places, and those having families will be at straits to feed those dependent on their services for existence. We cannot but regret it, notwithstanding ours is the dominant party, and many of our own political family are enabled to find a livelihood at the expense of those who are "thrown on their own resources." However, it is but political history repeating itself, and it will continue to repeat. It is one of the features of politics in our country. The successful party finds itself struggling for the crumbs that fall for two or three years, enjoy the meager provender that but maintains a family, and before they are aware of it their time is up, and without a cent put by for the morrow enforced idleness and distress confronts them and their families. It is but an additional evidence that the youth of our land should be taught to earn their bread without the adjunct of political position, for it is a slippery rock that is treacherous and will not long sustain him who attempts to stand upon it alone without other support.

Promotions of Teachers.

There is very much of truth and good sense in the following suggestions made by City School Superintendent Hart, in his annual report: "A question of vital importance, seriously affecting the welfare of our schools, is the just promotion of teachers. This should be done on the basis of merit and length of service. What encouragement is there to a faithful, deserving teacher when she finds her time and talents are passed over, and others of lesser merit are promoted to the position which by hard labor she has rightly earned. Every incentive, every stimulant to the attainment of the higher place is destroyed, and that which should have afforded a pleasure and a gratification, sinks into mere drudgery. Justice and impartiality, and not extraneous influences, should be the rule in making promotions." Yet there have been instances where promotions have been effected through extraneous influences, and merit and experience discarded. If the encouragement of promotion upon merit alone was extended, we are of opinion in some instances there would be more efficiency in the department.

She—"Harry and Kate are going to be married." He—"So? Too bad, isn't it, that they should do anything to bring about an estrangement, when they think so much of each other?"

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of Charles Reams, an insolvent debtor. Charles Reams having filed in this Court, his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said Charles Reams is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the county of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said Charles Reams, debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered that all creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the county of Sacramento, in open Court, at the court room of said Court, on the 20th day of February, 1891, at 1:30 o'clock P. M., of that day to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS a newspaper of general circulation published in the county of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.

Dated, January 15th, 1891.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

The National Swedish Ladies' Concert Company will give one of their famous concerts at the Congregational Church Jan. 20th.

On Monday evening the Alcazar Company will commence a season of four nights with The Magistrate. This has never been before on a Sacramento stage. The company is strong.

Russell's Comedians, including those sterling artists Fay Templeton and Charley Reed, filled the Metropolitan to overflowing last night. So much has been written and said in laudation of this great combination, that there is little left to say. To-night the same bill.

Eunice Goodrich, with her stock company, will play a parting engagement for one week at the Clunie Opera House, commencing Monday next. Very popular prices is the rule with this company, which makes it a favorite with a large class of people who attend theaters seldom.

The Fete of Nations has filled the Clunie Opera House nightly. The ladies and gentlemen participating in those pleasing entertainments are entitled to great credit. The programme is varied and artistic throughout, each evening there being something new. To-night the Fete will close with a fancy dress party.

It Came Home to Him.

In one of Bret Harte's clever parodies of the French he tells a story in words something like these: Three gamins were playing in the streets of Paris. A priest passed by. "There goes a priest," cried one, "look out for your eggs and your chickens." Then the priest, hearing the words, knelt down and prayed for the boys. But upon reflection he was convinced that it was not the fault of the boys, but of their parents. He knelt down the second time and prayed for the boys' parents. On another thought he saw that it was not the fault of the boys' parents, but of society. He knelt down again and prayed for society. As he rose from his prayer he said to himself, "My friend, who is society? You and I are society." So he knelt down the last time and prayed for himself.

A Little Worse Than Ours.

Here are some stories that Gazaway Harbridge tells about members of the Georgia Legislature:

When one of them introduced a bill on the first day and the Speaker asked: "Shall this bill be committed or engrossed?" he replied, being somewhat at a loss, "Jes let it stay thar awhile, Mr. Speaker."

They tell me that another brother missed the roll-call one morning and in dire distress went to Governor Northen, humbly petitioning to be reinstated.

One of them asked another for a chew of tobacco. "I'll return the favor some time," said he. "No, you needn't return it," said the other, "I'm making $4 a day and don't mind the expense."

Another one went down to Bob Harde-man's office to know how much salary he could draw. "Oh," said the Treasurer, "I guess you can get all you want." "Well," said the legislator, "I need some money for myself, and the old woman needs some, and the revenue officers are after one of my boys. Can you let me have $2 25?"

Nellie Grant Sartoris.

Nellie, the daughter of General Grant, since her marriage to Algernon Sartoris, has drank the bitter dregs of domestic sorrow. The following appeared in the daily papers on Monday last:

PARIS, January 10.—Algie Sartoris, Nellie Grant's husband, is dying from delirium tremens in the south of France. The head of the family has been sent for, but physicians say there is very little hope of his recovery.

And this from a letter penned by Col. Ochiltree and published in the N. Y. Sun:

With her two daughters and her 13-year old son, Nellie Grant Sartoris spends the fashionable season in a magnificent house in one of the most fashionable quarters of London, Cadogan square, that is pronounced as if it were spelled Caduggan. She also has a fine country place. I dislike extremely much talking about her private affairs, but as it is well known that she and her husband do not live together, and as there have been many surprises which are capable of doing her wrong, I will speak briefly concerning them. Mr. Sartoris is not a pleasant kind of an individual, and Nellie found it out to her cost within a short time after she had married him, and that discovery was one of the greatest griefs of General Grant's life. His conduct in later years became such that his wife could not live with him. Without going into the equities of the matter, the justness of Mrs. Sartoris' position can be easily judged from the conduct of her father-in-law. Up to the time of his death the elder Sartoris was a devoted friend and admirer of his American daughter-in-law, and by the terms of his will Nellie Grant is now a very rich woman, living in a house that cost £40,000 and enjoying an annual income of £7,500, while her husband receives a liberal allowance only, which ceases with his death and reverts to his children. Mrs. Sartoris is a frequent and welcome guest at Malboro House, and once in two weeks she dines with the Queen, which it is needless for me to add, is a distinction conferred upon few people not of royal or aristocratic birth.

Saltiness and Temperature of the Ocean

Generally speaking the ocean is understood to preserve a uniform saltiness. Under special circumstances, however, we find the saltiness increased as by the excess of evaporation over the fresh water influx in the Mediterranean and Red seas, and about the northern and southern limits of the tropical belt; and decreased by the contrary cause in the Sea of Azof, Black sea, Baltic sea, and in the Polar regions. The following table gives the amount of salt contained in a ton of sea water in various parts of the ocean:

Sea.	Percentage of Salt.	Salt per ton of water.
Caspian sea.....	0.5	11 pounds
Black sea.....	1.2	27 pounds
Baltic sea.....	1.3	29 pounds
English channel.....	3.3	74 pounds
Atlantic ocean.....	3.7	83 pounds
Mediterranean.....	3.9	87 pounds
Red sea.....	4.3	96 pounds
Dead sea.....	8.5	190 pounds

The maximum temperature of the Gulf stream is about 86 deg., or about 9 deg. above the temperature of the surrounding ocean. Increasing in latitude 10 deg. it loses but 2 deg. of temperature, and after having run 3,000 miles toward the north it still preserves, even in winter, the heat of summer. With this temperature it crosses the fortieth degree of north latitude, and there, overflowing its liquid banks, it spreads itself out for thousands of square leagues over the cold waters around, and covers the ocean with a mantle of warmth that serves much to mitigate, in Europe especially, the rigors of winter. There is a popular notion that our climate has, during the past twenty years, been largely controlled by the waters of the Gulf stream.

A painter about to receive a visit from a duke, bade his little boy put on his best clothes. The child refused, saying: "I won't dress up for a duke." "Well, then, it's a king," said his father. The young gentleman promptly submitted to his toilet. On being asked why he yielded in the case of a king, the child responded: "I want to see his two heads." His knowledge of kings was confined to playing cards.

Down to Bed Rock.

The chariot of missions both at home and abroad will drag heavily until we get down to bed rock on the subject of Christian stewardship. Weekly giving or laying by is the divine rule. "Every one according as God hath prospered him," is the divine standard. A recognition of God's ownership of ourselves and of all we have underlies the whole movement. When national conventions, and State conventions, and associations, and ministers' meetings, and theological professors, shall unite in a movement to discuss, and state, and restate, and affirm and reaffirm the doctrine of Christian stewardship, and to apply it to every man and child in the church, and shall practice it and advocate it fearlessly and sustain each other, one and all in the advocacy of it, in the home, in the prayer-meeting, and in the pulpit until the church is delivered from the withholding spirit of covetousness, then shall we begin to see the dawn of the latter day. The practice of "annual collections," or of occasional collections, answered passably well for the missionary exigencies of thirty years ago, but they will not answer for the missionary demands of to-day. At present, strained finances are characteristic of all of our benevolences; such appeals, such efforts, such groaning by secretaries and agents, such entreaty, such beseeching, such fightings without and fears within, of boards and committees as the ends of the years come round and the deficiencies are feared! There is no occasion for it whatever. It can all be prevented and a tremendous uplift be given to foreign missions, and home missions, and state missions, and city missions, and universities, and colleges, and seminaries, and academies, and church extension, and what not. Instead of so much talk and so many speeches and addresses and orations and anecdotes, why not devote some of the best time of a convention to practical conference on this subject?—Dr. W. Ashmore.

The Most Prolific Fruit.

The most prolific of all the fruits of the earth is believed to be the banana. Its produce is enormous. One thousand square feet planted with thirty or forty bananas will yield as many clusters, with 160 or 180 fruits on each, and each cluster weighing from 40 to 80 pounds, so that 1000 square feet will produce 4000 pounds of nutritious substance; whereas, the same space in our soil would grow only 33 pounds of wheat, or 99 pounds of potatoes. The produce, therefore, of the banana is to wheat as 133 to 1, and to the potato as 44 to 1. It is not so nutritious as wheat, but an acre of bananas will support twenty-five times as many people as an acre of wheat. The sweet orange, too, is wonderfully productive. One tree at St. Michael's in the Azores, has been known to bear 20,000 marketable oranges in one year, besides 4,000 or 5,000 thrown away as unmarketable. The cocoa palm will annually yield as much as a ton weight of nuts, and the date palm will, when in full bearing, produce a yearly crop of from one to four hundred weight.

Marriage Solemnization.

The celebration of marriage in churches was first ordained by Pope Innocent III, about the year 1200. Before this date the only ceremony was that of the man leading his bride home to his house. But it was not until several centuries after Innocent's edict that the injunctions contained in it were generally obeyed. Both forms of marriage remained in vogue and they were respectively called "par devoir" and "par amour"—marriage of duty (i. e., to the church), and of love. Both were legal. But the church frowned upon the latter, and being all powerful gradually educated the minds of the people till there was a stigma attached to it. By an old law marriages could be celebrated in the church porch, or at the church door. Chaucer, in his "Wife of Bath," alludes to this custom:

She was a worthy woman all her life,
Husbands at the church door had she five.

The marriage of Francis II with Mary Stuart took place at the door of Notre Dame.

Women as Physicians.

So far as can be ascertained the first woman on record who held a medical diploma was Anna Morandi Mazzoni, who filled the chair of anatomy at the University of Bologna about the middle of the last century. Other Italian women who became doctors of medicine were Maria Petracini, 1788, and her daughter, Zaffra Ferette, 1800; Maria Mastellau, 1799, and Maria del Doune, 1806. In Germany, Frau von Heidenreich, 1817. The first English woman who studied medicine and received a diploma was Miss Elizabeth Blackwell, who graduated at Geneva College, in New York, January, 1849. Availing herself of her English nativity she returned to England, took advantage of the retrospective clause in the act of 1858, and demanded and obtained that her name be placed on the British register. Two Russian women were the first of their sex to graduate at Zurich, Switzerland, having entered their names for medical training in 1868.

Snake-Killing Birds.

The secretary bird of South Africa is useful in destroying the serpent race, on which it almost exclusively feeds. It derives its name from the curious feathery plumes which project from each side of its head and have a fanciful resemblance to pens carried behind the ear by human secretaries. Undaunted by the deadly teeth of the cobra, the secretary bird comes boldly to the attack, and in spite of all the efforts of the infuriated and desperate reptile is sure to come off victorious. In its combat with the serpent the wing is its most important weapon, and answers equally all the purposes of a shield and club. As the serpent rises to strike the secretary presents the front of its wing as a buckler, and almost immediately dashes the serpent to the ground by a blow from the same member. It also kicks with considerable force and almost invariably concludes the combat by a violent blow on the head from its beak, which lays the skull of the enemy completely open. There are several other birds which destroy serpents. The condor, the darter of South America, the adjutant of India, our North American blue jay and several other species of the hawk and owl family.

Bulls and Bears.

The terms "bear" and "bull," used to denote certain classes of stock brokers, are as old as the South sea bubble, 1710. A man who contracted to sell stock of which he was not possessed at a certain price was called a "bear" in allusion to the proverb, "Selling the skin before you caught the bear," and he who bought yet did not intend to receive the stock was called a "bull" as a distinction. The contract was merely a wager, to be determined by the rise or fall of the stock; if it rose the seller paid the difference to the buyer proportioned to the sum determined by the same computation to the seller.

So was the huntsman by the bear oppressed
Whose hide he sold before he caught the beast.

To "bear" the market now means to use every effort to depress the price of stock in order to buy it, and to "bull" it is to raise the price of stock when operating for a sale; hence the Stock Exchange is sometimes called "the arena of bulls and bears."

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of M. D. Thomson, an insolvent debtor. M. D. Thomson, having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which it appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said M. D. Thomson is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said M. D. Thomson, debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the Court room of said Court, on the 6th day of February, 1891, at 10 o'clock A. M., of that day, to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that the order be published in THE TIMES, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.

Dated 29th December, 1890.

W. C. VAN FLEET,
Judge of the Superior Court.
PHILIP S. DRIVER, Attorney for Insolvent. ja3-51

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to LOUIS C. MCADAMS, greeting: You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State of California, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 2d day of January, 1891, in which action Laura A. McAdams is plaintiff and you are defendant. That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To obtain a decree of said Court, dissolving the bonds of matrimony, now and heretofore existing between plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds of the failure of the defendant for more than one year last past to provide the plaintiff with the common necessities of life, he having the ability so to do, and upon the further ground of the conviction of defendant of felony in British Columbia, and that his discharge from the confinement in pursuance of said conviction on —day of May, 1890, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made, and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said county of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief described in her complaint.

In witness whereof, I, Wm. B. Hamilton, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do herewith set my hand [SEAL] and affix the seal of said Court this 2d day of January, A. D. 1891.

W. B. HAMILTON, Clerk.
W. A. GETT, JR., Attorney for Plaintiff. ja3-91

SUMMONS.

IN THE JUSTICE'S COURT OF WASHINGTON Township, County of Yolo, State of California.—I. U. Gill, plaintiff, vs. Albert Wines, defendant. The People of the State of California send greeting to Albert Wines, defendant: You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the Justice's Court of Washington Township, County of Yolo, State of California, and to answer before the Justice, at his office in said township, the complaint filed therein, within five days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons, if served within the township in which this action is brought; or, if served out of said township but in said county, within ten days; or within twenty days if served elsewhere. Said action is brought to recover the sum of $49.95, viz.: for board and lodging and for goods sold and delivered at special instance and request of you, the said defendant, as will more fully appear by reference to the complaint on file herein. And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will take judgment against you for the above amount, to wit: $49.95, and costs.

Make legal service and due return hereof.

Given under my hand this 22d day of October, 1890.
CHAS. A. NEWTON,
Justice of the Peace of said Township.

H. K. WALLACE & CO

What to do With the Hands.

"My dear fellow," said a society woman of great candor to an awkward, timid young Harvard graduate whom she was to present, "you have any amount of talent, you have position, you have money, but you will never be at your ease; never show at your best, until you know what to do with your hands and feet. You must lose them, forget them, be unconscious of them."

This is easier said than done; and yet it is possible by the persistent use of a few simple exercises which bring relaxation and freedom from stiffness, and others which encourage flexibility and strength of muscles. Cultivate the habit of letting the arms fall and place themselves as they will when standing or sitting without occupation. Learn to swing them, one at a time, back and forth, like a pendulum hanging from the shoulder, the elbow joint straight and easy, but not taut. Lift the length of the arm as a weight from the shoulder very quietly and slowly as high as it will go, and bring it down in the same manner. The muscles across the back are awakened to a wonderful degree. Try this movement singly, and again with both arms, fifty or a hundred times a day. With the arms hanging at full length, elevate the shoulders slowly, and turn them in a rotary motion toward the back.

A daily practice of such simple movements calls one's attention to the varied actions and use of joint and muscle; the idea of using the arm from the shoulder is understood, and the habit of bringing different sets of muscles into play in alternation and succession becomes second nature. This is the numbering of one's forces, and training them to do each its own part. It is a kind of personal massage, the virtue of which lies in the minute search for weakness, flabbiness, and lack of development in the smallest muscle, and the daily gentle manipulation which strengthens it by action. No woman wants that close knit sinew and knotty, woody fibre that many men seek to obtain from athletics. It is entirely opposed to the offices of life to which nature calls her; she does want firmness and flexibility, staying power, and endurance.—Emma Moffett Tyng, in Harper's Bazar.

The more avaricious a man becomes the less just he is and the less he cares for the happiness or prosperity of others, and, losing an opportunity to make money for himself, he will grasp his opportunity and call the misery he causes to his neighbor adversity.

MABEL'S GRANDMA.

"The world is even as we take it,
And life, dear child, is what we make it."

This was the sentiment of an old lady to her grandchild Mabel. And many a Mabel has found it to be true, and she has taken care of her health. She keeps on hand a supply of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, and so is not troubled with those wasting diseases, weakness, "dragging-down" sensations and functional irregularities that so many women endure. It is the only medicine for women, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money will be refunded. This guarantee has been printed on the bottle-wrappers, and faithfully carried out for many years.

"Favorite Prescription" is a legitimate medicine, not a beverage. Contains no alcohol to inebriate; no syrup or sugar to derange digestion. As peculiar in its remedial results as in its composition.

As a powerful, invigorating tonic, it imparts strength to the whole system, particularly to the womb and its appendages. For feeble women generally, Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the greatest earthly boon; being unequalled as an appetizing cordial and restorative tonic, or strength-giver.

A Book of 160 pages, on Woman and Her Diseases, their Nature, and How to Cure them, sent sealed, in plain envelope, on receipt of ten cents, in stamps.

History of Dancing.

The earliest mention of dancing occurs in the Bible in the song of Miriam, the prophetess, who "took a timbrel in her hand and all the women went out after her with timbrels and with dances," Exodus xv:20. From a subsequent passage (Exodus xxxii:19), referring to "calf and dancing," it is evident that dancing in religious pagan ceremonies must be of a very ancient date, and this is borne out by the hieroglyphics found in Egypt by Wilkinson. The habit is innate in human nature and is probably as ancient as primeval man. It was practiced among the Jews, as part of their religious offices, and although the fact is not positively stated in the New Testament we have every reason to believe that it was introduced into the religion of the primitive Christians. Homer mentions the practice, and it is said to have been invented by the Curetes, B. C. 1534. The ancient Greeks delighted in it, and in Sparta a law was passed making it compulsory for parents to have their children taught. It was introduced into the drama and also into the Roman pantomime, B. C. 22. After all this historic record, respectable as it may be, it is a fact that many young persons of the present time "run dancing into the ground" and waste much time that is not needed for exercise nor for graceful appearance and deportment.

J. H. MILLER, Managing Editor.

We assume this Legislature will not be an exception to its predecessors, so far as the matter of the consideration of claims against the State is concerned. Many of the claims made are just; many without merit. It has occurred to us there would be wisdom in the passage of a bill establishing a Court of Claims—a law founded upon the Federal procedure. The State is the sovereign; however aggrieved, no one can sue the State; if wronged, the citizen must trust alone to a relief bill. Were it relief was granted in all proper cases, there could be no criticism adverse; it has been, however, not so. Claims have been lobbied through that had but a shadowy foundation, while others of merit have been defeated, in that the interested parties knew not how to strike the temper of the Houses—plainly, the lobby. The principle is simply this: If the State justly owes a citizen, it should pay; if one prefers an unjust claim against the State, it should not be paid. Under the present system, insufficient time is given for examination of claims. They are presented to the Committees on Claims, it might be said, ex parte, and ordinarily legislative action is taken upon the committee reports. In our judgment a better method would be to establish a Court of Claims, wherein the claimant could present his evidence fully, and the legal representative of the State could have opportunity to counter it if necessary. A judgment would not of course be rendered, but the evidence taken and findings made, and upon that evidence and those findings the Legislature could intelligently act. We have opposed the creation of additional Commissions, and believe some now existing should be abolished, upon the broad ground that they are of value only to those who draw salaries from them; but in this matter we believe the State will save much money if provision will be made to formally collect the facts concerning claims before the legislative sessions begin. Possibly, better judgment may dictate that the matter of taking the testimony and preparing findings in such cases should be made a part of the duty of the Judges of the Superior Court. That certainly would not be a bad idea, for the law officer of the State could be present, and the merits of the claim would be tested judicially, and all the facts developed, before the Legislature would be called upon to act.

The education of our people so as to realize and understand the true import of citizenship is one of the great economic questions of the day. Our loose custom of admitting aliens to become citizens may become a dangerous rock in the course of the great ship of State. We have a number of times adverted to the matter and called upon the Courts administering the rights of naturalization, to guard this prerogative with a jealous care. There is also an indifference in the education of our native born boys in the true science of civil government. Nearly all the tricks and frauds of admitting aliens to citizenship are performed by corrupt ward strikers, and the poor foreigner is himself innocent of the ultimate course contemplated. In the last number of the North American Review, Henry Cabot Lodge devotes a carefully prepared article on the subject of the restriction of immigration, which is, indeed, the greatest danger that now besets our nation. We have not now the vast area of lands, fertile in their character, that we had a few years ago. While there are millions of acres of unsettled lands, still the desirable lands are very limited, and there is no more than will serve for the natural increase of our present population. In our large cities the struggle for existence compares with that of the older countries, and is as fierce as that experienced in the Old World. The labor market is in many localities overstocked, and wages are declining. Herein lies the peril, socially and politically. In our thickly populated districts one-half of the people do not know how the other half live. This dreadful state of affairs is intensified and increasing every year, which certainly admonishes those in authority that something must be done to avert the threatened evils that must per force follow the indiscriminate immigration from the shores of Europe. "What shall be done to protect our labor against the undue competition, and guard our citizenship against the infusion which means deterioration?" If Congress would pass and enforce laws against the influx of Europe's paupers and criminals, this great and threatened condition of affairs could be averted. Mr. Lodge suggests that each immigrant shall bring from his native land an effective certificate from our diplomatic representative, that he is a proper person to become a citizen of this country, and not a pauper or criminal, and not diseased. Illiteracy should also be a bar to immigration. We have enough of the illiterate classes of Europe. It is from the illiterate, ignorant and prejudiced foreign element that the greatest danger to our government arises. Such restrictive measures would benefit every honest and worthy immigrant who really desires to make our country his home. This is the great labor problem, and the true solution lies in restricting this undesirable foreign element. A writer in Century has struck the key note in the following language:

There is a tendency on the part of a good many people to belittle what is termed politics. The reason of this is not difficult of discovery. Many of the methods employed in "practical" politics are bad and disheartening. The men who use them are not agreeable, either in person or in perspective. But, next to the bread and butter employment, politics is, to the ordinary citizen, really the most important consideration. The protection of life and property, the imposition of taxes, the relations of the State to individuals and industry, the duties of individuals and industries to the State—the importance of all these cannot be overestimated. It is these things that the foreigner who has come to America to pass the remainder of his life needs to know. The better teachers he has in genuine Americanism the better it will be, not only for him, but for the country, and the sooner he will master enough of the essentials necessary to enable him to cast a manhood vote in the full and true meaning of that term.

An honest reform in any matter, either private or public, is always commendable. Obedience to the express provisions of the law, is the foundation stone of our government. While the statutes prohibiting gaming are in force, they should be observed, but like very many other penal enactments these have been practically dead letters upon our books. Like the existence of the social evil, it has come to be looked upon as one of the human weaknesses that cannot be eradicated. Thus, when we experience the periodical recurrence of those spasms of virtue, we are constrained to scan closely the impelling motives. 'Tis true there are honest and conscientious people who insist upon the enforcement of the letter of the law, but the influence that prompts these people generally has another motive. In those cases it invariably transpires that Satan turns informer, and the most vicious, mercenary, blackmailing scoundrels are in the back ground. These Plutonic emissaries, who are desirous either of exactng a monied consideration for silence and protection, would now have us believe that Sacramento is a veritable Sodom or Gomorrah, and that the avenging hand of Jove should smite us. We are confident that no true reform is intended, and that the instigators wish and hope to realize some substantial benefit, either coin or political preferment, by this crusade. Has it only just been discovered that gaming and pale-faced frailty exist? Has it just dawned on these "good" people that weak human nature indulges in chance? There is always a very suspicious look upon all sudden efforts to revolutionize or abate long existing evils, unlawful though they may be. We believe our new Police Judge is sincere, and desires to perform his whole sworn duty. We also are satisfied that some of the good men who are agitating this question are in earnest and wish to eradicate an evil, and to enforce the law. But going a step further, we observe the smooth, sinister and mercenary hands of those who wish to extort money. Another designing element is also discernable, and which seeks to foist certain individuals into political power. From all the surroundings it is apparent that tribute is the prime motive. As matters now stand, these evils—gaming and the social evil—have been the victims of extortion by those who are called officers of the law, from time immemorial. It is an open secret that heavy levies are constantly made on these classes, and that this present assault is only a forerunner for tribute from a faction. There is only one true solution of these social problems, and that is regulation and license. Under such an order of affairs, the corruption of municipal officers would be averted, and we would not only derive a revenue, but have such a surveillance as would deter many from becoming votaries at these shrines of evil. License and regulation is the only way to sweeten these waters of Jericho. This is the only way to invoke the star-eyed goddess of reform.

We observe that Mr. Boruck is out in a lengthy letter to the Bee in defense of the pardons that were granted in the last days of the administration of his superior, acting-Governor Waterman. In Mr. Boruck's letter it would seem his desire is to shift the responsibility upon the shoulders of others than the then acting Governor. In the case of Jack Kiley, who had been convicted for an assault committed upon a woman in San Francisco, from the effects of which, if we understand it aright, she suffered death—in which case, had we possessed the power, we would have sent Mr. Kiley to the gallows—Mr. Boruck in apology says the sentence was commuted at the earnest appeal of prominent gentlemen, whom he names. We are unable to understand why these gentlemen should become interested in the matter of freeing such a wretch as Kiley from the penitentiary, and from our knowledge of the gentlemen named feel there has been something of misrepresentation. Again, Mr. Boruck speaks of the pardon of Creighton and Northey, and it would seem from his statement that Creighton knew not what he had done. However, the people of San Francisco had elected this man Creighton to the State Senate, and had placed in his hands the power to vote upon that which might become the laws of an American State. By his own confession he was a party to the bribing of a jury in a case in San Francisco; he fled the country, but returned and pleaded guilty. Yet of him Mr. Boruck writes:

I was present when the Governor finally pardoned Northey and Creighton. A delegation of Senators, headed by Hon.

F. C. DeLong and Hon. J. H. Mahoney, with nine other Senators, waited upon the Governor in his office and appealed to him in behalf of Creighton. They represented to the Governor that there were principals behind Creighton; that the latter was comparatively a boy; that he would do anything for a friend, and he had done what he did, not knowing he was performing a criminal act; that he was a dupe and was languishing in prison on that account.

Is it possible acting-Governor Waterman was made to believe that Creighton was comparatively a boy, and that in bribing a jury he knew it not to be a criminal act? Did we believe it, we would pronounce Waterman the dupe and not Creighton. We have not the space nor the disposition to refer further to the pardons the granting of which shrouded the closing days of Mr. Waterman's acting administration with merited infamy. It would seem from the statement of Mr. Boruck, that upon the intercession of one or two persons, in so serious cases as convictions for murder, the weak executive threw open the doors of the penitentiary and permitted convicted felons to walk forth free. It is our deliberate judgment Mr. Boruck would have rendered a service to the late acting Governor had he not attempted an explanation of that concerning which the people have very defined ideas. We observe that the Bee takes issue with the late private secretary concerning the pardon of Arthur D. January, and in the statements of that journal there is entire correctness. This paper and the Bee did intercede for the pardon of Mr. January, and in that matter had such backing of influence that would at least have commanded the respectful attention of an executive. Are we mistaken that when the petition was presented and the statement made that January was dying of consumption in the prison, the acting successor of Governor Bartlett replied that there were many in the penitentiaries of California that were dying?

The death of George Bancroft removed about the last of those who can be classed as representative of the old-time literature of this nation. He was born October 3, 1800, and graduated from Harvard in 1817. His education was thorough, and his first published work was a volume of poems issued when he was but 23 years of age. Looking back to the age in which he lived we find he survived very distinguished contemporaries, and that at the ending his life record equaled theirs. To think! of the older American authors, there now survive but Dr. Holmes and John G. Whittier. In the time Bancroft lived, and in his prime, if it can be regarded that age ever robbed him of his prime, he was contemporaneous on this continent with Nathaniel Hawthorne, William Cullen Bryant, John Lathrop Motley, R. C. Winthrop, J. Fenimore Cooper, William Gilmore Simms, Henry W. Longfellow and Washington Irving, all of whom he outlived. Across the ocean he had for contemporaries Sir Walter Scott, Lord George Gordon Byron, Percy B. Shelley, Richard B. Sheridan, Charles Dickens, Thomas Hood, Alfred Tennyson, Victor Hugo, T. B. Macauley and many others whose names will be permanently identified with the literature of the world. It is strange that in looking back at the life careers of the men who have distinguished themselves in this country in the field of permanent literature that but three ever entered practically into politics. Winthrop served several terms as a member of the Legislature, and was Speaker of the Thirtieth United States Congress. Bancroft was Secretary of the Navy during the administration of President Polk, and for a time also acted as Secretary of War. Later on he represented the Government at the Court of St. James, at Russia and in Germany, and yet while thus actively engaged in political life did succeed in emanating the volumes of history that have made him a man of note, and that will be to him a monument throughout all time. Motley was a diplomat. Living in his time were also men who exercised much of influence in ephemeral journalism, such men as Horace Greeley, Thurlow Weed, George D. Prentice, James Gordon Bennett and Henry J. Raymond. Coming down to our own State, we had in the same line Lauren Upson, Henry C. Watson, Samuel Seabough and James McClatchy, among others. The death of Mr. Bancroft could reasonably have been expected, in that age had come upon him. He had survived ninety-one years, and had pursued an active and useful life. Hawthorne, a finished and scholarly writer, it may be said classical, died at the age of 60. Bryant, who wrote "Thanatopsis" when but 19 years of age, a poem which still holds its place as one of the most impressive in our language, continued in the harness for eighty-four years, and in his later years, in addition to his general literary work, was the editor of the New York Evening Post. Motley devoted his attention to European history. The works of Cooper will ever be read with interest. There are in them merits, that they refer to a people now about extinct, the Indian tribes of New York. It is, however, to be regretted that he was a man of such prejudice that in some of his more important works there is a tincture of bias that does not concern the generation of to-day, and that mars what might otherwise have been a better product of his magnificent intellect. Simms and his works seem almost forgotten, and in the libraries his novels are unfrequently called for. Yet it is, there is much of merit in them, and particularly are they interesting that they relate largely to the period of the American Revolution, a field that has not been trodden by any other novelist. He was a native of South Carolina, and in some of his works there is a vein that strikes with harshness those of Northern birth and training. Of Longfellow we need say nothing. That which he left is of more consequence to the world than to him, and he passed away a creditor of mankind. Our estimate of Irving may be unjustly biased. We have never been able to disassociate his "Legend of Sleepy Hollow" and the prolonged slumber of Rip Van Winkle with lassitude, though it must have been he was industrious. While his works, as a rule, tend to history, in some of them there is much of humor. Particularly was this characteristic of his earlier writings, and in "Rip Van Winkle," the rendition of which in drama made Jefferson, there is a refined commingling of pathos and absurdity. We recollect years since of reading an anecdote of Irving that when returning from a visit to Europe and approaching the harbor of New York, there being but one razor on board, and that his property, he suggested that the bearded passengers should at first shave one side of their faces; that at his turn, being what might be termed the middle man, he should shave the other side also, and that the others should follow and complete their shaving; but that when he had finished his shaving he threw the razor into the sea, and save himself the male passengers landed in New York with but one side of their faces shaven. Scott died at 61, and his works were finished. They are masterpieces. Dickens died at the early age of 58, and never completed "Edwin Drood." In that work there is an ending of stars. The last chapter is entitled "The Dawn Again," but that dawn never came to him. There is something about the last chapter the great novelist wrote that is touching, and it would seem he had a premonition of the event that would happen so soon. And think of the erratic Byron, who lived but to the age of 36, yet in his brief career he lived much of life. That he has passed away, it is but charitable that a cloak should be cast over his defects. And Shelley, with his brilliancy, drowned in the Bay of Specia when but 30 years of age. Touching it is that under the quarantine regulations of Tuscany his body, when it drifted from the sea, was burned, yet in the presence of his friend Lord Byron. We have not the space to further review the contemporaries of Mr. Bancroft, nor does opportunity afford to contrast the general character of the age in which he was active, with that of the present day. While it must be conceded that we look upon the older writers as having been more able, it must be admitted that the literature of this day will develop to be equal with that of the past. It is natural with men to regard more the works that survive on library shelves after the hands that penned the lines have met the paralyzation of death, than to regard the writers who now exist. The evil of the present day is that too much is printed, some good, some indifferent, and some very bad. Looking backward, we are prone to think the places that have been occupied by the standard authors will never again be filled. However it will be, others will take their places, and while it may not be that the genius of the past will for a time demonstrate, it will come. True it is there has been but one Shakespeare and that the nearest approach to him has been Lord Lytton, yet will it not be that the works of Shakespeare, perfect as they are, will be equaled in this generation? As we have said, Mr. Bancroft seems to have been about the last to survive of the old school; he died full of years; the work he did will exist; younger men will take it up and complete it.

Judge Philip W. Keyser died at Yuba City on the 15th, after a protracted illness. The Judge was one of the ablest of the men who have occupied positions on the nisi prius bench in this State. He was born in Baltimore, in 1824, and received a thorough legal education. He arrived in California in August, 1849, and at first engaged in mining. In 1850 he was elected Alcalde of the now extinct town of Eliza, near Marysville. Later on he was elected to the State Senate, and was appointed by President Pierce, in 1853, Postmaster of Marysville. In 1860 he was appointed County Judge of Sutter county, and but with a slight intermission, filled that office until 1869, when he was elected District Judge, and in that capacity served until the abolition of that tribunal by the new constitution. He was elected the first Superior Judge of the counties of Yuba and Sutter, and was the incumbent of that office until his death. His successor, Judge Davis, is a man of ability, and Governor Markham is to be congratulated that his choice fell to one so worthy. Of Judge Keyser the Marysville Appeal remarks that which will meet with the sincere response of very many:

The news of Judge Keyser's death will be learned with sorrow by thousands of persons to whom his genial social qualities were well known. Within the sphere in which he lived no man could have had more warm personal friends, or been more generally loved and admired. His cordial nature and affable manners endeared him to everybody. The sunshine of his kindly disposition cheered and brightened the pathway of all with whom he came in contact. To many grieving friends the announcement of his death will recall the lament of Hamlet:

He was a man, take him for all in all,
I shall not look upon his like again.

Perhaps the first instance of the death of a monarchical sovereign on our soil was that of King David Kalakaua, at San Francisco on the 20th inst. The relations that have existed between the people of the Sandwich Islands and the American Republic, while appreciated at Washington, are more appreciated at San Francisco and upon this coast; and while it is that much regret is expressed at the death of the King, there is to this people the saddening recompense that he did not die among strangers, and that we were able to render in his last illness the tokens of sympathy and regard that were appropriate to a man in his station and under his surroundings. It is indeed unfortunate that the cruiser Charleston will carry with it to Honolulu the first news the subjects of the late King will receive of his death, and instead of what they had anticipated—his return in life—the war ship will convey to them his body. A review of the life of King Kalakaua is of interest. He was not of royal birth, but was elected King February 12, 1874, by the Legislature, and ascended the throne against the wishes of the people. It can be imagined he ruled a turbulent people, but in some instances, and particularly in the revolution that occurred a few years ago, when it can be well said his throne was tottering, he tided over the troubles, and by the pursuit of a liberal governmental policy brought order from chaos. The succession will fall upon his sister, who, it is understood, is a woman of executive ability, and it cannot be anticipated the relations between this country and the islands will be interrupted. Time may come when the Sandwich Islands will become a portion of the United States. It is but natural that will transpire. However, such an event will not be likely to come about except the initial movement will be made by the people of the islands.

Speaking of Birchall, the murderer, Prof. Goldwin Smith says: "Had he, instead of being sent to college, been kept steadily at work at some useful calling, he might have gone decently and perhaps creditably through the world. Sending him to college, where, having no literary tastes, he was sure not to study, and where, being idle, he was sure also to be dissipated, was a mistake which sealed his doom. That no boy should be sent to college who does not show a decided inclination to study, is a lesson which Birchall preaches to us from a felon's grave."

Do Children Pay?

Does a two-year-old baby pay for itself up to the time it reaches that interesting age? Sometimes I think not. I thought so yesterday when my baby slipped into my best study and scrubbed the carpet and his best dress with my bottle of ink. He was playing in the coal-hod ten minutes after a clean dress was put on him, and later in the day he pasted fifty cents' worth of postage stamps on the parlor wall, and poured a dollar's worth of the choicest white rose perfume out of the window, "to see it wain."

Then he dug out the center of a nicely baked loaf of cake, and was found in the middle of the dining-room table, with the sugar bowl between his legs, and most of the contents in his stomach.

He has cost me more than $100 in doctor bills, and I feel that I am right in attributing my few gray hairs to the misery I endured while walking the floor with him at night during the first year of his life.

What has he ever done to pay me for that?

Ah! I hear his little feet pattering along out of the hall. I hear his little ripple of laughter because he has escaped from his mother, and has found his way up to my study at a forbidden hour. But the door is closed. The worthless little vagabond can't get in, and I won't open it for him. No, I won't. I can't be disturbed when I'm writing. He can just cry if he wants to; I won't be bothered; for—"rat, tat, tat," go his dimpled knuckles on the door. I sit in silence. "Rat, tat, tat."

I sit perfectly still.

"Papa."

No reply.

"Peeze, papa."

Grim silence!

"Baby tum in; peeze, papa."

He shall not come in.

"My papa."

I write on.

"Papa," says a little voice, "I lub my papa; peeze let baby in."

I am not quite a brute, and I throw open the door. In he comes, with outstretched little arms, with shining eyes, with laughing face. I catch him up in my arms, and his warm, soft little arms go around my neck, the not very clean little cheek is laid close to mine, the baby voice says sweetly, "I lub my papa."

Does he pay?

Well I guess he does! He has cost me many anxious days and nights. He has cost me time and money and self-sacrifice. He may cost me pain and sorrow. He has cost much. But he has paid for it again and again in whispering these three little words into my ear, "I lub papa."

Our children pay when their very first feeble little cries fill our hearts with the mother-love and father-love that ought never to fail with all earthly passions.

Do your children pay?

Freaks of the Wires.

Many have been the laughable mistakes made by telegraph operators in transmitting messages, says the Hartford Courant, but it is seldom that one is recorded so amusing in its consequences as occurred in the summer to a gentleman in this city.

He was spending his vacation at the shore. A dance was to be given one evening, and, as M. — expected his brother down from the city to attend the festivities, he bethought himself of the excellent plan of sending to him for some flowers, which are always acceptable to the young ladies on such occasions.

The scheme was no sooner conceived than it was put into execution. The telegraph office was sought and the following message was written and directed to Mr. —'s brother in Hartford:

"Bring three dozen Bon Silene roses."

With a tranquil mind and a happy heart Mr. — awaited the simultaneous arrival of his brother, the roses and the eventful evening. But meanwhile the telegraph operator had got in his work, either at one end of the line or the other, and so far no one was the wiser.

Mr. —'s plans, for the distribution of the roses were doubtless well settled, and he eagerly awaited his brother's arrival. At length the latter hove in sight; but, goodness gracious! what was the matter with him? He was loaded down with bundles, and out of his pockets peeped still others. In fact, it seemed to be only with difficulty that he could get along at all, so weighted down was he with mysterious packages.

After partially recovering from his surprise, Mr. — demanded to know what in the world his brother was swearing at. The latter, as soon as he had breathed enough, demanded in his turn, in an injured tone of voice, to know why he had sent for so many. "I brought all I could," he added, "and that was two dozen and a half."

"So many what?" returned Mr. —. "What have you got there anyway?"

The brother's suspicions began to be aroused and he said nothing, but drew forth the telegram which he had received:

"Bring three dozen beers sub rosa."

The Stage.

(Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.)

It is the thing now at very swell parties to provide professionals to play, sing, dance, recite, tell fortunes or read minds for the edification of the invited guests.

Stanley and the ponderous 300-pound infants in the Drury Lane pantomime of Babes in the Wood at Niblo's continue to be the reigning sensational features of life in big New York.

A new operatta with the long title A Roman Carnival in the Times of Marquis del Grillo has made a hit at the Rossini Theater, in Rome. The music is by Zucanni, and the libretto by M. Berardi.

Ida Lewis, the life-saver of the Newport lighthouse, has been offered a tempting salary to go on the stage as leading character in a life-saving scene; but she says "No," and continues to trim the lamps she so loves. Ida has wisdom as well as a strong arm.

Sarah Bernhardt will come to this country in February, to appear first in La Tosca, followed by Cleopatra, Fedora, Jeanne d'Arc, and Camille. She will play for five weeks, and will visit Philadelphia, Boston, Montreal, Detroit, Indianapolis, St. Louis, Denver and San Francisco, whence she will sail early in May for Australia.

If the Thurber bill goes through Congress we shall have a National Conservatory of Music established at our national capital on October 11, 1892. This conservatory, as planned by Jeannette M. Thurber, is to be the peer of those at Paris, Vienna, Milan, Leipsic or Berlin. It is to be supported by voluntary contributions, and is founded so that our children and we ourselves need not go into a foreign country in order to receive the best musical instruction.

As in other professions, the "woman" in theatricals is rapidly advancing to a sphere of prominence, excelling the "man" in point of wealth accumulation and ability to retain the dollars. In a great many instances, and in some of the largest cities, the opera houses are either managed directly or controlled by women, and many of the theatrical organizations now on the road have a manageress instead of a manager. It seems odd enough, but it is nevertheless true, that there are not a half dozen managers in the whole profession worth a half million dollars, yet there are certainly five women who manage their own companies who can boast of wealth even exceeding this amount, namely: Lotta, Sarah Bernhardt, Lily Langtry, Modjeska, and the late Emma Abbott.

J. L. Toole, the British comedian, is about to return to England after a year's absence. His season in New Zealand was a brilliant and profitable one, but in Australia he did hardly so well, and he has abandoned the proposed tour through the United States as involving too great a risk. As we recollect, Mr. Toole visited this country about thirteen years ago, meeting with indifferent success, a result due, we think, to his extreme British methods. Mr. Toole is the greatest, if not the only, surviving representative of the old school of British low comedy, and in his own country he is simply a popular idol. He evidently believes in the one-star theory; at any rate, he has always a wretched company about him, and his performances are invariably marred by the glaring incompetency of his support.

It is a singular fact that in the whole history of dramatic literature not a single instance is to be found where the American Hebrew has been successfully idealized. Two or three pieces have been written with such an object, but their authors failed to make the groundwork plausible, and the efforts widely missed their aim. Any number of pieces have been written satirizing the characteristics of the thriving race, and have been successful, but all attempts at glorification thus far have been utter failures. After the close of the highly sensational season of the English pantomime of Babes in the Wood at Niblo's, next month, a new local melodrama is to be presented there, entitled Noah's Ark, the central character of which will be an Israelite pawnbroker. The new play is expected to do justice to the many admirable traits of the descendants of Moses, and to show that they are capable of as much self-sacrifice and heroism as their exalted Christian brothers.

Book Chat.

A flow of language and a tide of speech,
Tho' coursing east and west and north and south,
Unlike all other rivers, streams and floods,
Comes as it were directly from the mouth.

Amelie Rives Chanler has completed another novel, of which Richard Henry Stoddard, who has seen the manuscript, says, sententiously, he thinks the pruning-knife will have to be used before the book is published.

Young Author—"I've hit on a name for that story of mine, Tom. A regular inspiration. I'm going to call it 'The Inevitable.'" Tom—"For heaven's sake, why?" Young Author—"Why? Because the editor will have to accept it."

The poet Whittier has received, as a birthday present a barrel of pitch-pine kindling from the Whittier Colored School at Tuscaloosa, Ala. When the venerable man lights these at his fireside he may see in the coals thereof pleasant pictures of the good his tongue and pen have wrought for the poor and oppressed everywhere.

Francis Coppee, the French writer, is now in his 50th year and lives with his sister Annette in a secluded street of Paris. Coppee's first name is frequently written "Francois," but that is improper. He writes it "Francis," and most of the cyclopedias and biographical dictionaries give it in that way, expressly correcting the popular error.

Mr. Louis J. Jennings is said to have written a novel which will shortly be published. Neither of Mr. Jennings' ambitions nor of his abilities as a writer of fiction have we any positive knowledge, but we venture to say that Mr. Jennings' name will go thundering down the ages as that not of the novelist but of the man who edited the London edition of the New York Herald.

There is a rich young man in Chicago who, meeting a lady friend a while ago, bade her rejoice with him in that he had just purchased a fine library. "I do indeed rejoice," said the lady, "for good books are the best companions a young man can choose. Now, tell me, what are these books?" "Oh, I don't know their names," answered the young bibliophool, "but there are 800 of 'em."

Literary Industries, is a late publication from the pen of Hubert H. Bancroft. If there were no other evidences of the literary labor of the author, this would be sufficient to establish the fact. Mr. Bancroft gives a brief sketch of his early childhood, and from youth to maturity, down to the culmination of his great life labors. No one could read this volume without pleasure and instruction. It is teeming with philosophy and sentiment, while giving the history of his labors in collecting the material for Native Races, Essays and Miscellany, and History of the Pacific States. The author in this book gives a chapter on the habits and peculiarities of authors generally. When we contemplate the vast amount of research accomplished by Mr. Bancroft, the fabled labors of Hercules sink into insignificance. It seems almost incredible that there could have been such results in so short a space of time. Within fifteen years these great literary labors have been rendered from crudity to perfection. It will well repay any one to read Literary Industries for the sentiment and philosophy, as well as the historical part thereof.

Professional Chat.

Young Doctor—I prescribed for my first patient yesterday. Young Lawyer (anxiously)—Has he made his will yet?

The story that the Governor of Missouri eats pie with a knife is a base canard. He hails from St. Louis, and in that city etiquette demands that the eater grasp the pie gently but firmly with both hands, extending each thumb and index finger along the periphery to guard against breaks, and supporting the under crust with the remaining fingers. The pie is then elevated to the mouth and nature does the rest.

In Jersey City there is a very bright little girl of six years, whose father is a Presbyterian with an occasional fondness for the bottle. They live a few doors from the church. A few Sundays ago the parents went to the communion service and baby was left at home to escape the long ceremony. It was a warm day, and "Coronation," the usual closing hymn, floated out through the open windows. The good deacon took the pastor home to dine with him. When the grace had been said little Bessie remarked: "I knew you was comin' home, papa." "How did you know, little one?" "Cause I heard the song." "What song?" asked the preacher. "Oh, you know; the one where you say 'bring forth the royal demijohn.'"

A young lawyer in an eastern city secured one of his first clients in this way: He was attending a card party and noticed that an old and wealthy citizen had taken a note for $16 from his pocket to keep the score on. He spoke to him about it, and was told that the note was worthless. "But, sir, I am sure I can collect it for you," the limb of the law replied. "Well, you can have half of it if you do," said the owner, and handed it over. The young man failed to secure the money, and was about returning the note when a thought struck him. "Mr. —, I have collected that note for you," he said. "What? You haven't though!" exclaimed the delighted capitalist. "Yes, sir, and here's your half," the lawyer replied, taking from his pocket $8 of his own hard-earned cash and handing it to the old man. The result was that the capitalist concluded that if the young lawyer was capable of collecting such a debt as that he was equal to anything and he transferred all his extensive legal business into his hands.

The Wreckly Star, of San Francisco, is in its 14th volume. Barry always intends to be right, and is a bitter enemy of all kinds of corruption. His assaults on "bossism" in San Francisco, did much towards defeating that element last election.

Even the doors of love, and heaven itself, are opened by the touch of gold. Mind, by want or ambition pinched, is driven to market and, like cattle, sold to the highest bidder. Too much wealth, however, means poverty of heart and head.

Hubert Bancroft, Pacific Coast Historian, after recounting the scenes and trials of his childhood, calls upon the Deity to pass him Hebe's cup that he might be young again, and try this mystery once more. There are few, indeed, who would wish to live their lives over again.

We observe that the House Committee on Claims has reported favorably on Bruner's bill for the compensation of Geo. Nelson, for unlawful imprisonment and enforced labor. There never was a more just measure. The State cannot afford to permit the great wrong done Nelson to go unrequited.

The dramatic novelties in Chicago are of a character that simply baffles description. Can our dramatic art be said to be at an ebb when we find it represented by such towering geniuses as the Vaidis Sisters, John L. Sullivan, Henry Aveling, Duncan B. Harrison, Frank Frayne and Louise Dempsey? For the no one packing houses fade into insignificance under the surpassing brilliancy of the other kind of butchery.

The Empress of Germany has military tastes as well as her husband. At the late grand review on Templehof field she was in the saddle for two hours, riding superbly and leading her own regiment of cuirassiers past the Emperor. Her uniform as Colonel was a habit of white cloth, embroidered on shoulders and collar with the red and silver colors of the regiment, and a three-cornered white felt hat with many ostrich feathers, in which she looked remarkably pretty.

General Miles announces that the Indian war is over. The hostiles have surrendered and promise to be good Indians. Secretary Noble, in talking of the policy to be pursued with the Indians hereafter, said that first of all they should be deprived of firearms. The intellect that could master the mechanical intricacies of the Winchester rifle was quite capable of appreciating the noble simplicity of the plow, and he proposed to give the hostile Sioux an opportunity as well as an incentive to earn their own living.

For the want of something mean to say about the Republican Administration the great Democratic dailies of the nation are charging the Indian hostilities upon the President. So contemptible are they that the President is personally accused of instigating the skirmish where some women and children were killed. It is one of the strange things in politics that the other side is always wrong. All the ills that befall the country are invariably attributed to the opposition. These people would rather believe the opposition all corruption than to believe the truth.

The census announcement that there are one hundred and forty religious bodies in the United States, exclusive of many independent congregations, will be received with some surprise by most people whose knowledge of different sects does not embrace more than a dozen or twenty at the most. In the list, as disclosed by the preliminary bulletin issued by the Census Bureau from Washington, are the General-six principle Baptists, the Schwerkfeldians, the Theosophical Society, the Life and Advent Union, and others, which, to a majority of people, will be entirely new. With one hundred and forty creeds formally adopted and "many independent organizations" with their own notions besides, the task of those who favor church union is difficult indeed. If only the more numerous denominations existed, the labor of effecting a unity of churches with regard to policy and the more essential doctrines might be easier, but what shall be said when a hundred little denominations, sturdy in their beliefs and customs, are in the field, loth to give them up.

Siren Influences of Bond Holders.

Our Board of Trustees must be stupid, ignorant, or subject to the seductive allurements of some of our bonded creditors or their agents. That was a masterstroke of diplomacy, of the Tallyrand order, when the bond holders generously consented to defer their demands for interest eight months in order to aid in certain public improvements. Generous men! generosity with a string to it. The Trustees must have been blind—or the other alternative—when this scheme was invoked. Why, the bond creditors conceded comparatively nothing, as the only substantial creditor for the next four years is the city itself, through the Funded Debt Commission. In round numbers the entire annual interest is $90,000, of this amount the Commission holds nearly $70,000 coupons, payable this year—indeed, for the next four years the Commission holds three-fourths of all the coupons; so the philanthropic action of the creditors is mere fancy.

But we must look for the motive for this sudden interest in Sacramento's welfare. One of the bonded creditors, and an agent for many others, presented an old bond of 1854, for $5,000, asking that it might be funded by issuing an 1893 bond, with coupons attached, which would make the amount of the city's liability on this action something like $22,000. As an inducement for the Board to allow this little joker to pass, the creditor proposed to aid local improvements by subscribing for $5,000 of the street improvement bonds, with the "magnanimous" concession that no interest on the general debt would be demanded for eight months. This was, indeed, a siren offer, when we consider that the bond creditors had little interest to collect, and the further fact that our street bonds are as good as gold bullion.

This same old bond bobbed up several years ago, and was rejected by the then Board of Trustees. Suit was instituted on the same, which came before Hon. John Hunt, Jr., Superior Judge of San Francisco, sitting in place of Judge Van Fleet. Judge Hunt, in an able opinion, decided that the action was barred, rendering judgment for the city. An appeal was taken to the Supreme Court and the judgment affirmed. Subsequently a rehearing was ordered which is now pending. Notwithstanding this situation, we find the Board of Trustees actually considering the proposition to refund this bond for six or seven times its face value. As a merchantable commodity it has no value whatever at present. Even if by some untoward chance the Supreme Court should reverse itself, it would be time enough to listen to any proposition for refunding. Some of the members of the Board of Trustees, in seeking for an excuse to allow this illegal and barred demand, indulge in a bit of sentiment to the effect that the city should not invoke the statute of limitation. Do these very honest and sentimental gentlemen take into account the fact that the present holder of this old claim bought a law-suit when he obtained it—bought it with the distinct understanding that the city does not consider it a legitimate demand? Gentlemen of the Board, you cannot afford to give away the people's money in this manner, no matter what allurements are offered.

The face of the moon when seen by the naked eye appears to be mottled, but when seen through a telescope the surface is seen to be covered with mountains, valleys, and plains, but there are no seas, lakes, or rivers, and in the opinion of most observers no water at all. Therefore there can be no clouds to shade it from the sun, and no dew or rain to water it. It is also thought that there is no air around it, and so that no sound can be heard there.

The Lawyer.

Why should a lawyer affect warmth for his client, or assert his belief of the justice of his client's cause if he did not expect to make some impression thereby? What do his warmth and assertions mean? Is he lying and dissembling for the mere pleasure he finds therein, or to exhibit his consummate talent as an actor? Clearly not, but in the hope of thereby aiding his client. If he felt that every one would regard his show of earnestness and solemn asseverations as so much stage play he would certainly intermit them. He employs them with an obvious, undeniable view to effect; and, so far as he does so in defiance of his own convictions of justice, he is a hypocrite and a knave. The induration of habit and the unquestioned acceptance of a false morality may enable him to do this without a consciousness of its villainy, but it is utterly impossible that a man should go on from day to day affirming wrong to be right, and conjuring up sophism and subtleties intended to impose on others the erroneous opinions which he affects, but does not entertain, without deep and lasting injury to his own character. Hence it is that the vulgar conception of lawyer and rascal as convertible terms, though exaggerated, has a foundation in fact. The mass of mankind are and always must be familiar with the lower and less honorable exhibitions of lawyer-craft. They do not see Webster arguing the Dartmouth College case or Wirt arraigning Burr, but the village pettifogger rehashing his little store of legal quips in defeating an honest claim (?), or some county attorney clearing a hog thief from his well-deserved State prison tour by picking a flaw in the indictment, and they too rashly conclude that law and knavery are synonymous.

Here is the young attorney, just launched, with his sheepskin in his pocket, his shingle over the door, his board and rent to be paid, and the alternative plain before him of business or the meanest kind of bankruptcy—inability to pay his bootblack or laundress. Now, the best, most honorable, most profitable business is morally certain not to come to him—he must accept and be thankful for such as the bell-wethers will not touch. As he is musing over his blue-black prospects in steps a sleek, oily, soft-spoken customer who wants legal aid to cheat his wards out of their patrimony, break a brother's will in favor of his beloved wife, or harry some poor-devil editor whose police reporter has incautiously stated that said customer was arrested on a charge of grand instead of petty larceny. Now, it is very well for Mr. K—, the bell-wether, sitting at ease in his own elegantly furnished house, with a fair rent-roll and a number of first-rate clients, to tell Brother Briefless not to dabble in such dirty business, to "reject with scorn" the fifty dollars laid in his hungry palm, to preserve his self-respect, and "hold out until the end," but not quite so easy for Briefless to satisfy his tailor and landlady with such east wind. They are matter-of-fact people, and "the end" of their patience is already visible to the naked eye. So Briefless clutches the fee and lets drive at the widow, the orphans, the editor, against whom he has no evil intent whatever except in the way of business. The world's his oyster, and he must get his knife into it wherever an opening presents itself. He knows this is dirty business, but "hungry dogs" can't afford to be particular. He knows, moreover, that he will be estimated and prospered not at all according to the merits of his case, but according to his own skill in handling it. If it is a very bad one, and he nevertheless wins it, he will be more profited by it than by winning a dozen good ones. Let him achieve a decided success in plundering the widow, the orphans or the editor, and he may soon ride in his carriage, pick and choose his cases, and discourse as flowingly and bravely as the bell-wethers of the beauty of "adorned" his profession and studiously observing all the decencies and preserving all the proprieties. In fact, he has meant to do this from the first, and this was one of his inducements for taking that first scoundrelly fifty dollars.

The fundamental wrong is in the system which sent him forth thus a human spider, to live by his net. There ought to be no such letting loose of young attorneys to prey on society as we every year witness. Lawyers should be chosen by something akin to the good old Calvinistic doctrine of effectual calling—that is, our social relations should be such that a man should be required as a lawyer before he should be permitted to turn his back on wholesome, honest productive industry and shut himself up in a den, seeking whom he may devour. How very great a change in society this involves we thoroughly realize, but until some such change takes place it would be idle to hope that the legal profession can be cleared of the popular odium which now attaches to it as the peddler of sophistry and panderver to knavery.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO.—In the Superior Court.—In the matter of the petition of W. C. Hays, an insolvent debtor.

Upon reading and filing the petition, schedule and inventory of W. C. Hays, the above named petitioner, and on motion of L. S. Taylor, his attorney, it is ordered and declared that said petitioner is insolvent. And it is ordered that the Sheriff of the County of Sacramento do take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of said insolvent debtor (except such as may be by law exempt from execution), and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee. And all persons are forbidden to pay any debts to said debtor, or to deliver any property belonging to such debtor to him, or to any one for his use, and said debtor is forbidden to transfer any property to any one except said Sheriff. And it is further ordered that a meeting of all creditors of said debtor be held on Monday, the 9th day of March, 1891, at 10 o'clock A. M., at the court room of the Superior Court aforesaid, in the court house, in the City of Sacramento, to prove their debts, and choose one or more assignees of the estate; and that a copy of this order be published in the THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation, as often as said paper is published before the day set for the meeting of creditors. And all proceedings against the said insolvent are hereby stayed.

LOCAL BREVITIES.

The electric street railway will be in operation by the middle of February, perhaps a few days earlier.

Work upon the foundation of the post-office building is progressing rapidly. Forty laborers are at work.

Dr. Gill's Botanic Cough Syrup is a guaranteed remedy made in Sacramento. Will relieve the most troublesome cold almost instantly. Try it.

Every printer in the State out of employment is in the city. The State Printer says they remind him of impecunious lawyers. They are all looking for a case.

Stockmen's Liniment. For rheumatism and neuralgia, sprains and bruises its effect is magical. Both the above for sale by Kirk, Geary Co. and J. Hahn & Co.

The interior of the State Capitol never looked so well as at present. W. C. Hendricks, the late Secretary of State, had an eye to the beautiful. His selection of workmen was of the best, and his taste admirable.

On Eighth street, between J and K, in this city, two colored men run a shoemaker shop. There is nothing singular in this, but every Irishman that passes that way looks in and laughs. Their sign reads, "Oreilli & Kelley."

Ludy & Anderson have reopened and renovated the popular oyster and chop house on the corner of Ninth and K streets. They are old hands at the business, place upon their tables the best the markets afford, and are deserving of a liberal patronage.

Among the appointments at the State Capitol last week, that of John Barrett as Park Policeman was one of the best made. Mr. Barrett has always been a consistent Republican, and one of the best political workers in the city. It was an appointment well deserved and very properly bestowed.

The Sunday Leader, J. N. Larkin & Sons, proprietors, heretofore issued on Sunday morning, will, after the 1st of February, appear as a Sunday evening paper. Mr. Larkin is one of the oldest in the profession in the State, a thorough newspaper man, knows the wants of the community, and gets out a paper that is a credit to the Capital City. The Leader is all that its name implies. "Johnnie" leads; he never follows.

An Assemblyman from one of the rural districts stepped into the Cafe Royal the other day, dropped a nickel in the slot and had five minutes' fun with the phonograph. He has a large bank account and was so well pleased that he offered to buy the "instrument." Harry Gamble told him he was the agent, and they were worth $1 apiece. The statesman ordered 1,000 for his constituents. Harry told him he would send the order in to Edison, a partner of his, and the goods would be delivered immediately. As the lawmaker left the place he remarked, "That $1,000 will make me the next United States Senator."

Portraits of Cleopatra.

The question of Cleopatra's beauty is an old one, but it has been brought into fresh prominence by Sardon's "Cleopatra," and Mrs. Langtry's revival of Shakespeare's play. The only authentic portrait of Cleopatra that is known to archaeologists is a bust which appears on a series of coins. It is on the reverse, and bears the inscription in Greek, "Queen Cleopatra, the Divine, the Younger," while on the obverse is a portrait of "Antony, Dictator for the Third Time, Triumvir." The workmanship of the coin is far from good, and this accounts in some measure for the undeniable plain appearance of the Queen. Yet the likeness, so far as the features go, is a true one, for the other coins of the same series, though of a different type, give her the same features—an aquiline nose, a strong chin, a long neck and narrow shoulders. The fact is, that her beauty was not so remarkable as one would think from the spell she cast over Cæsar and Antony. Plutarch, for instance, tells us "that her beauty in itself was by no means incomparable nor calculated to amaze those who saw her," but adds that the magnetic charm of her manner, the gracefulness of her movements, the persuasiveness of her conversation and her figure were most attractive.—Pull Mall Gazette.

In the present Austrian society one of the most interesting figures in many regards is undoubtedly the Archduchess Stephanie, the widow of that unfortunate Prince who died by suicide at the beginning of 1889. Although Belgian by birth—her father is the reigning King Leopold II.—she has a good deal of the Hapsburg blood running through her veins. Queen Marie Henriette, her mother, being a daughter of the late Archduke Joseph, palatine of Hungaria. Her union with the heir of the Austrian crown was enthusiastically applauded by the populace. She was a sweet girl of seventeen, with blonde hair and blue eyes, when she married Rudolph in 1881, and the first years of the marriage were happy ones. She is thoroughly educated and is gifted with an enthusiasm for scientific pursuits.

The Preacher's Parrot.

Elwood Bruner is a good after-dinner orator. He is also an excellent story-teller. A few evenings since at a banquet at the Capital Hotel he perpetrated the following: In one of the interior villages of New York resided a Methodist minister. He had been married for some years, yet had no children. His wife raised a number of canaries and pets innumerable, and always expressed a desire to own a parrot, or a talking bird. One day the minister was called to the city, and in passing a bird fancier's he noticed a fine parrot. He soon ascertained that the bird was educated, bought it and took it home and presented it to his delighted wife. The next afternoon a number of the parishioners were at the minister's arranging for a social. All at once one of the ladies became angry and used some very emphatic remark. The parrot ruffled up his feathers and fairly shrieked, "the devil you say." The entire assemblage stood aghast at such blasphemy in the home of a minister. The latter apologized by saying he did not know the school the bird attended.

Presently, another used some emphatic language, when the bird again, louder than before, cried out, "the devil you say."

The minister became angry and was about to pitch the bird out of the window, when an old deacon who was present, suggested that if the parrot made use of the language again that the minister should take the cage and whirl it around his head several times and then set it down on the floor very hard. The bird would understand this as a rebuke and would not repeat the offensive language. Just then the bird looked squarely at the deacon, and in a much injured tone said: "Oh! the devil you say." This was entirely too much for the preacher; he seized the cage and whirled it around a dozen times or more, then gave several twirls for luck and jabbed the cage upon the floor with all the strength he possessed. The parrot was hanging on the perch by bill and claws, his wings extended, his feathers scattered about the room. Every one was eyeing the bird. The latter stroked down his ruffled plumage, viewed himself all over, and then looking straight at the minister said in a surprised tone: "Jee whilkens, Governor, how the wind did whistle through my whiskers."

The Weather.

The highest and lowest Signal Service temperature during the past week was 64° and 32°, as against 50° and 34° for the corresponding week last year. There was no precipitation during the past week, while the corresponding week last year gave a total precipitation of 2.84 inches. The present season's rainfall to date amounts to 4.67 inches, as against 21.31 inches to an equal date last year. This is the driest season since that of 1886-87, when, up to the first of February, there was but 4.22 inches; the total for that season being 13.97 inches. Although the season of 1887-88 gave but 11.55 inches, 7.37 inches of that was precipitated before February 1st, 1888, while February, 1887, was an extremely wet month (6.28 inches).

An Eastern alienist gives it as his opinion that constant attendance upon baseball games may cure insanity. This seems to be a novel application of the principle "similia similibus curantur."

[For THEMIS.]

Make-Shift Life.

There are people whose lives are made up of make-shifts, in hopes of something better by and by. The new year comes around with its inevitable record, and we all at once remember how many of these make-shifts have grown into habits which now it has become impossible to alter or dispeuse with. It may, perhaps, remind us of the folly of this patchwork sort of existence, and lead us to begin the new year as if we had to continue on here forever as we live through this period; as if we were certain beforehand that each act would congeal into a habit, and that habit cling to us for good or for bad through our whole existence. This, no doubt, will be the case with our make-shifts, or nine out of ten of them. They will not only keep us company, but form part and parcel of ourselves. It is so in regard to expenditure. Every habit and characteristic of extravagance on the one hand, or of meanness on the other, has sprung from some one act performed at the moment for the purpose of temporary expediency, and never intended to be repeated. The life of the miser is but one of make-shifts, congealed into habits. And so is the life of the spendthrift. A man indulges in an act of prodigal expenditure utterly disproportioned to his means, because he regards the occasion rare, and not to be treated according to ordinary rules. But at the close of the year he foots up his account and finds that his expenditure has exceeded his income considerably. A few years roll round, and just as this sort of life has become so regular that it ceases to be noticed, the Sheriff is down upon his property. Or else the love of money seizes a man: he pinches here and he pinches there, unjustly and illiberally. Each year shows an enormous gain. He has intended to act thus only until he has gained a certain point. But the make-shift life has become a habit. Those who might have been his real and natural friends have deserted him, injured in some way by his meanness, until he finds himself alone, wealthy, but despised, hated and friendless.

It is thus also with all convivial excesses. A man will say and believe that he is strictly a temperance man in his principles, because he never drinks alone. But each friend he meets is a special occasion and exigency, and such men will have so many friends and so many special occasions in the course of a little while, that the exception becomes the rule and the make-shift the habit of life. Each new year brings its hopes and vows of reformation as soon as its friends have gone and its excitements, but every year witnesses also a deeper and deeper relapse.

The student finds all this the case with himself. It often happens that the relaxations and amusements of such a man form a more important characteristic of his life than his regular pursuits. Walter Scott as the lawyer and Walter Scott as the Sheriff have long since been forgotten, but Walter Scott as the hunter-up of old Scotch ballads, Walter Scott as the poet, and Walter Scott as the novelist, will never die, and the only pity now seems to be that such a writer should ever have wasted his time in the drudgery of Court business.

It is by making every act part of a system of life, the end and limitations of which are fully determined and never exceeded, that a man alone comes to be truly aware of what his right sphere is. It is the only life in which there is any real satisfaction. Many a man, as he reads these lines, will remember one or two great mooring-ports which he has set for himself, and to which he has bound himself successfully, which have kept him from drifting fatally upon a thousand rocks and quicksands on which he has seen wrecked neighbors and friends without end.

Let each one commence the new year by balancing the ledger of his make-shifts, not pecuniarily so much as mentally, morally, and socially, in their effects upon him and his circumstances, and he will be increasingly disposed from all the experience of past years, we think, to abolish the whole round of them, to look all indulgencies and exceptional actions in the face as habits—habits that will form his character. He will wish to begin by living on such a system that, if protracted eternally here, it would not tire or wear out or run down, but, like a good farm, yield a fair living for its possessor each year, while the value of the property itself and character of its possessor were daily being increased.

Vanities of the Sexes.

Vanity and women are, of course, synonymous. And so proverbial that long ago it became pardonable. The crime is now for women not to make the most of their beauty, or in having no natural claim to the blessing to neglect studying the art that will produce an effect of comeliness.

An outward application of pink and white complexion is still criticized and frowned upon—if anyone is so indiscreet and vulgar as to have it discovered—but nothing is thought of a woman's devoting half of each day in the establishment of some kind of a beauty distributor. There are the different kinds of baths—Turkish, Roman, vapor, sulphur, alcoholic, and the every-day common hot and cold water baths—that are warranted to produce perfect flesh and exquisite fairness. There is the massage treatment with different refined oils with which to mould the attenuated figure into a divinity beside which an artist's dream would pale. And there is the same treatment and the same oil to bring human avoirdupois down to within shooting range of the dream. And there is physical culture and dress reform. And when all these things fail there is the substitute that dims even brilliant beauty. This substitute is a twist in an intellectual whirlwind of "isms," occult sciences, esoteric philosophies, with the twist straightened out once in a while by Shakespeare, Shelley and Browning. All of these things may be built upon a foundation of vanity, but the result is recognized as present civilization, and the solidity of the foundation is never questioned.

How many generations must we wait before the vanities of men will disappear in results? Possibly some of their vanities have gotten into the obscurity of science, but there are others so conspicuous that even the Hindus, or any other believer in things occult, can find no veil to subdue the glare. Now, take the man who forces recognition of his intelligence by the shape of his hat and the length of his hair. Do you think he would doubt his ability as a lawyer being recognized with his hair cut the regulation length, if he had not discovered in some way that his hair had a natural wave and flowing silvery locks softened the careworn lines of the face. There may be a loophole for doubt about the long hair being an insignia of vanity, or belonging exclusively to high intelligence, but there is none about the broad-brimmed hat. The broad-brimmed hat is vanity's own accompaniment. The man with the long hair—be it straight or curly, gray, red, brown, yellow, or black, dry as husks or oiled until it glistens like a mirror—discovered that this style of hat must be worn or the hair must be sacrificed. So he wears it and calls it a "professional" hat, and says it is so light and so comfortable. And it never becomes uncomfortable unless sickness or hot weather overtakes him, and his intellectual locks become a glory of the past.—Chicago Herald.

The Whirlwind a Female Demon.

In Norway the peasants say that the "giant stirs his pots" when there are whirlwinds. In Sweden the popular belief is that a violent wind is the Skogara, or wood-wife, who shakes the trees and rushes violently through the air. The Slavonians think that the whirlwind is a female demon, who flies up in the dust when the whirlwind rages. One who made great havoc of her husband's crops was doomed to ride along with the storm to all eternity.

Endless are the folk-lore stories about the winds, varying according to the climate of the country in which they are told and the character of the people. Thus we have seen that in the North, where the winds are cold and bleak, they are looked upon as malevolent beings, while in the South, the land of sunshine and fair weather, only gentle breezes prevail.

The following Italian legend is told among the peasants on the Southern coast and is a fair specimen of their folk lore: A fisherman who had had bad luck for some time, overcome with anger, cursed the Madonna and the saints. Suddenly a certain person (who, we are told, was the enemy of mankind) appeared to him and promised him good luck if he would give him the next son he had when that son should be 13 years old. The man consented, but when the enemy came to claim his prize the fairy Colina duped him and carried off the boy to her own palace. He became her husband, but after a while wished to visit his home. On the way he had many adventures. He came to a dense forest, where he met an old woman named Borea, the north wind. She lived in the house of winds and she told him to beware of her four sons, who would devour him should they see him. But he was not afraid, and she hid him in a chest when she heard them approaching the house. When they entered they declared they smelt human flesh, but Borea promised to show them a man if they would not harm him. When she brought him out they puffed and blew about him, and asked him many questions. They kept their promise and did not hurt him, and after awhile Sirocco wafted him to his home on a gentle breeze.

Johnson—That man in the corner hasn't spoken a word this evening. Perhaps, like the Irishman's owl, he's doing a lot of thinking. Jackson—"Very likely. He tells me he finds it impossible to say a word in company, but he is a talented man, nevertheless; he is an author." Johnson—"Of what, pray?" Jackson—"Why, of that famous book 'Aids to Conversation.'"

Esop has told us the tale of a mule which, from overfeeding, galloped about and felt gay, saying to himself: "My father, surely, was a high-mettled racer, and I am his own child in speed and spirit." Next day he was sick and weary; he then exclaimed: "I must have made a mistake; my father, after all, could have been only an ass." A man, after eating a good dinner, may feel extravagantly joyous; but next day (I don't mean you to infer he feels like an ass) he is surly and grim, his stomach and liver are sluggish, he is morose, despondent and "out of sorts" generally. For Indigestion, Biliousness and all derangements of the Stomach, Liver and Bowels, Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery is an unequalled Remedy. Contains no alcohol to inebriate; no syrup or sugar to ferment and derange the digestive processes. It cleanses the system and cures pimples, blotches, eruptions and all Skin and Scalp Diseases. Scrofulous affections, as Fever-sores, Hip-joint Disease, Swellings and Tumors, yield to its superior alterative properties.

Ten Ponies for a Wife.

Among the Thibetans a man marries only one wife, whom he purchases from her parents, a belle often costing as much as ten ponies and thirty yaks. The price to be paid for the wife is arranged by a relative or a friend, who acts as go-between, and the only marriage ceremony is a grand spree, lasting as long as the bridegroom can afford to keep it up.

The life of a Thibetan woman in this part of the country cannot be deemed a hard one. She makes the tea, it is true, but with that the housekeeping ends; for no one ever dreams of cleaning the kettle afterward, and every one has to mix his own tsamba. Every four or five years she may have to sew a new sheepskin gown for herself or some of her family, but certainly not oftener. She cannot herd the cattle or sheep, men must do that, as there is danger from marauders. She passes her time spinning yarn, weaving a coarse kind of cloth out of which bags are made, turning a prayer wheel, and—destroying too voracious vermin.

Her toilet requires rearranging only four or five times a year—when she visits Kumbum or some other fair. Her children cannot outgrow their clothes; they have only to let out a little of the fold of the gown, their unique garment tucked up around the waist, and it will fit them until they are grown up.

Everything that can possibly be Egyptian is Egyptian. Possibly the daughters of the Nile might be astonished at our gowns that we make and declare to be in their likeness; but they answer our purpose very nicely, as we did not live in the days of the Pharaohs, nor yet in the time of Mark Antony. A long, flimsy robe, adorned with chaste jewelry and no sleeves, may be worn and called, by courtesy, a Cleopatra gown. Feather trimming and a feather boa add a modern touch to the ancient flowing draperies and make it a little more becoming. The hair must always be worn low with these ancient costumes. The dress also requires a graceful pose—a lovely, long, limp, willy-wally effect.

Governesses are the worst-paid class of gentlewomen. A girl who is neat and pretty, can furnish unquestionable references, play the piano or harp, sing, sketch and embroider, who loves children, understands German and French, and is willing to keep her place and hold her tongue, is paid $75 a month. If she is a faded rosebud, her services are valued at $60, although she may be unusually gifted.

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
J. H. MILLER, Managing Editor.

The indecent and very unkind conduct and language of a few of the Assemblymen last Thursday, during the discussion of a resolution for an adjournment through respect for the recently deceased King of the Sandwich Islands, were most deplorable, and are to be sincerely deplored by all who can see neither wit, wisdom or worth in them. The presumptions are, of course with customary exceptions, that legislators are gentlemen and are supposed to demean themselves with becoming deportment and in a manner becoming their station. That any one should so far transgress the bounds of common decorum on an occasion like that brought about by the resolution spoken of as to refer to the subject of it as the "King of the Cannibal Islands," and declare that he was "little removed from a cannibal," evinces a poor conception of the first principles of a gentleman. Doubtless had some "leader" of the House announced that he had suffered the loss of a favorite spaniel there would have been found among those who essayed to be humorous at the expense of the dead some sycophantic follower who would stand ready to offer resolutions of sympathy. 'Tis true the skins of some peoples are black, while with others it is the heart. Be it remembered of this dead King of the South Seas that in life his deeds of Christian charity were many and unostentatious. On the occasion of his first visit to this State, in 1874, he was known to have been liberal to many deserving poor, and few knew the fact save those whose duty it was to carry out his desires. A couple of weeks prior to his own death he learned of the sad condition of a poor, destitute, deserted woman who, abandoned by her heartless husband, lay dying in the County Hospital. In a rich city she, a stranger, was slowly coughing her young life away, scantily provided for by the hand of public charity. This kingly visitor from the islands, so derided by our boasting American legislators, heard of her condition and, remembering that he had once met her in his kingdom (when a girl she had visited there with her parents), ordered his Chamberlain to provide for her from his private purse, and to spare none of its contents in making her final hours as easy and comfortable as medical skill and science could accomplish. That woman did not recall the fact that her good benefactor was "King of the Cannibal Islands," nor did she deem him but little less than a man-eater himself. Doubtless she blessed him in her dying prayers. The rebukes by Judge Dibble of San Francisco and Mr. Bruner of this county, meted out to the (alleged) witty wisecracks of the House on the occasion spoken of, while milky mild in comparison to their deserts, were laudable, and are deserving the commendation of all self-respecting people.

A municipal election is approaching; it is of importance, in that it concerns our domestic interests. There is no need to draw the blind over our eyes that will shadow out the various interests that will be represented, and who will engage either openly or covertly into the contest. That the Republican party is in a natural position of advantage must be conceded. If it will fail in electing its nominees it will be because of the arbitrary and impolitic action that may be taken by the existing Central Committee of the party. Subjecting ourselves to the criticism of repetition, we will re-assert that which we have said in former issues, that many of the defeats we have suffered, particularly in municipal politics, are directly attributable to the short-sighted and suicidal policy of Republican committees in the matter of apportionment and precincting. It does seem strange that the many disasters of the past have not taught that advantages temporary have no permanency. That is to say, that the control of the convention and its nominations does not mean that the nominees, however meritorious, will be elected. It should be recognized that the mass of the people of this city and county are independent. It is to be regretted there have been times the result has been the election of men to office concerning whom the least that can be said was they were honest, yet of incapacity; that they had no conception of the responsibilities they assumed by their election. If the Republican City Committee will sink internal partisan bias and call the primaries in so liberal a manner that the members of the party will have opportunity for a full and fair expression there is little doubt the ticket nominated in convention will be successful; but so sure as the committee will call primaries that will appear to be arbitrary and favorable to particular candidates, there can be expected the result that has repeatedly occurred in the past—defeat.

It is well the political situation should be regarded as it actually is. There are practically two wings of the Republican party, and two opposing factions in the Democratic party. Yet there have been unions between portions of the opposing political organizations that would seem incongruous. In municipal matters the Democrats, as a rule, have secured the important offices, and from the result of the late county election, it is apparent they have much the advantage when consideration is had for their minority. In city affairs there are other elements that enter that are not strictly political, but financial; there are interests that care not at all for parties so long as they are able to control the elections, and to their discredit it must be said they in large measure control the purchasable vote, which, as a rule, when there is disaffection, determines the result. It is an open secret that money has been used corruptly in our elections, and by persons who make no secret that they are the dispensers, and who declare they are willing to sell their voting commodity to the person or the interest who will bid the highest. So bold, indeed, have these agents been that it is of surprise prosecutions have not been instituted that would have resulted in convictions, exposures and punishment. The Republican Committee is what might be classed as a public body, and it should be assumed to act within the party with good judgment and with impartiality. While we believe in administering severe political punishment in cases of manifest treachery, there is much of consideration to be had for men who are prompted by motives of honesty, and who rebel against dictatorial partisan management. In most cases it is true this element is duped, yet they never see it until it is too late to remedy.

We feel concerned in the approaching city election. We desire a Trustee elected who will be capable of understanding our municipal affairs. Last week the forms of this paper, after they were ready for the press, were unlocked for the insertion of an article to expose a scheme to breathe life into an outlawed bond; a piece of paper absolutely worthless, and one which had been so pronounced by the courts. Had the money of the people of this city. The punishment is harsh enough that those of the present generation should be compelled to pay the bonded indebtedness of the city, so lavishly incurred by men who lived here before many of the present property owners were born; to add to the burden by infusing life to paper valueless in the markets of the world, borders upon iniquity. This remark is not intended to apply to the members of the Board of Trustees, for we believe they were hoodwinked, and that the first knowledge they had of the scheme was from the columns of this journal. While we esteem it fortunate that from the official connections the editors of THEMIS have had in city and county governments they are enabled to give the word of warning in so serious a case as that of last week, it Board of Trustees taken the action they had indicated, they would have thrown away some $22,000 of the would be of better advantage if the people would elect officers who could detect imposition upon the city. Added to our present oppressive burden, a few such movements made successfully by the bondholders, would place Sacramento in a position that the infant of to-day will be gray-haired before the city will be relieved from the payment of unjust debts. At present it is hardly to our credit that it can be said we have the permission of our creditors at San Francisco to improve the machinery in the water works, nor is it inviting to capital from abroad that we are rated as a municipal mendicant. Under the rigid rule of the new constitution we can expect little hope from State legislation. There is but one salvation. The election of men on the Board of City Trustees who have the qualifications of first-class business ability and absolute independence; and who have or can acquire a knowledge of our municipal affairs. The election in March will afford an opportunity the people should not lose advantage of.

There is an officer whose term will expire and who should be re-elected without dissent. That is George A. Putnam, the City Collector. He has administered the affairs of his office in a manner so businesslike that it should earn for him a re-endorsement by the people. It would be, indeed, difficult to find one among us who would say with sincerity he could make an equal record. We anticipate, as we have confidence that the people will regard their own interests, that the force of popular opinion will bring about his re-selection. For Trustee, the name of Capt. J. D. Young has been suggested. He is competent and fully advised as to the city's interest. If selected there could be no cause of complaint. Alonzo Conklin is also suggested, but it is not probable that Mr. Conklin will come before a convention of Republicans. He declines to act with the wing of the party now holding the organization. Should Mr. Conklin be the nominee of the party he will be a strong candidate.

There are several reasons why Assembly bill No. 135, for the establishment of a State Weather and Crop Service, should pass both houses of our Legislature and become a law: 1st. There are dozens of applications to the Chief Signal Officer at Washington, D. C., for instruments to be used in taking observations, voluntary, of the weather of this State, but owing to the limited appropriation for the free distribution of government instruments to voluntary observers in the different States, Gen. Greely, the Chief Signal Officer, is compelled to refuse the applicant, as the limit for each State has been reached in California, which is about 16 stations. This shows a wide spread interest all over our great State for more climatic data, to be scattered broadcast over the country east of the Rocky Mountains. 2d. The crop service was inaugurated during the growing and harvesting season of last year by the signal observer in this city, as obtained from 20 or more weekly crop observers, which was condensed and telegraphed east and given to all press associations on this coast, and has proven so beneficial and popular, not only in this State, but in every State in the Union, that the Chief Signal Officer has instructed Sergeant Barwick, of this city, that a greater supply of blank forms and franked envelopes will be gladly furnished him if there is a prospect of the crop service being of greater dimensions than it was last season. The sergeant is now awaiting the results of the Legislature on the State Weather and Crop Service described in Assembly bill No. 135, before he makes a requisition for blanks, envelopes, etc.; for if the bill passes, his requisition will have to be increased many fold over what it will be if the bill does not become a law. A State Weather Service, in coöperation with the United States Signal Service, will have all their correspondence carried through the mails free of postage; but a copy of all observations in the State must be forwarded to the Chief Signal Officer at Washington. The Signal Service will furnish an assistant to help in tabulating the weekly, monthly and yearly reports, and will also give the Signal Service observer a limited leave of absence for the purpose of establishing the voluntary stations in the different counties of the State, provided there will be no expense to the United States for traveling or other expenses; this leave of absence will be granted on the request of the State Director if it would be deemed necessary by him. The United States Signal Service furnishes the "indications" daily to any city, town, or hamlet, that has telegraphic communication; provided, the parties receiving them, will furnish their own flags to be hoisted, which will tell by their color, shape and position, when hoisted, the weather for the next twenty-four hours; these flags would be furnished by the State Weather Service to any one who would hoist them for the benefit of the immediate vicinity, while the weather probabilities to be indicated by the flags, would be paid for and furnished by the general government, and telegraphed from San Francisco. For the carrying out of the provisions of this bill there will be asked an appropriation of between four and five thousand dollars, and after the establishment of the service the yearly expenses would be about fifteen hundred dollars. We heartily coincide with the provisions of the bill and hope to see it pass and the service well on its way by the time the weekly crop service begins in March or April next.

Bright minds are given to excesses. Geniuses have usually for an inheritance the most erratic propensities. We remember hearing the late John B. Felton—than whom there was no brighter intellect on this coast—remark that the hard worked professional and literary men needed the salutary effect of a periodical spree. "A good drunk with such men is a necessity," said that learned lawyer. The sensual side of human nature is an attribute to the intellectual—we mean in that limed degree just mentioned. Excessive brain work is wearing on bodily health, and per force, needs stimulation of some nature to quicken the thoughts and action of the wearied brain. With many there is exhilaration in pure air and bright sunlight. By far the greater number of brain workers demand a stronger stimulant. The writer can attest to the wonderfully brightening powers of quinine. Often when called upon for great mental labor, a few grains of this drug excites the brain to a degree that is surprising. Many great men in the empire of letters prompted their inspiration through the medium of various means. De Quincy fed upon opium, and his inspiration was stirred by the drug. Poe invoked the muse by rum, Dryden by a dose of salts. Herbert Bancroft in his Literary Industries philosophies on the foibles and weaknesses of great men, and recalls many individual instances of their habits and manner of inspiration. Pope drank strong coffee; Byron took large portions of gin; Newton called for tobacco and pipe to arouse his emotions; Napoleon had his snuff box at hand to aid mental action; Wedderburne put a blister on his breast when he desired to arouse emotion in a great speech. Thousands of literary men invoke opium to excite the brain. The Hasheesch Eater was written by Fitzhugh Ludlow under the influence of opium. Chas. Lamb drank brandy. Swift and Addison, strong beer. In fact, all the old English and Scotch authors were from three to a dozen bottle men. Daniel Webster enlivened his brilliant imaginations and great brain with brandy. The Iron Chancellor, Bismarck, invoked brandy to aid his brain. The great German literary men have the beer mug and pipe at their side while at work. Any way we treat the question, a man's mental strength depends greatly upon his physical condition. A strong intellect must have the support either of strong body, or stimulants. Our great men combined intellect with physical force. Bright, Brougham, Lyndhurst, Peel, Gladstone, Palmerston, Webster, Clay, Calhoun, Grant, Sherman, Sheridan, Lincoln, all were men of strong muscular action, capable of great mental strain.

Party methods have assumed a character that presents the highest awards to the most unscrupulous and dishonest candidate. The best wire-worker generally secures the nomination. The most fitting man is considered to be the one who indorses everything his party does, right or wrong. There is no chance for protest, no room for independence. Party methods are the remorseless masters of candidates for positions of trust. The duty of the citizen is to frown upon and break down these methods. Under the prevailing system a man's Republicanism or Democracy is measured by his allegiance to his party, and not by the principles he advocates. That he never "bolted a convention" or "scratched a ticket" is one of the highest recommendations.—S. F. Star.

Dame Gossip's Wedding.

"Have you heard the news? Dame Gossip is wed,"
One evil spirit to another said.
"Tell me about it," the listener cried;
And, in reply, said the friend of the bride:
"She wore Mrs. Envy's garment of green,
And the smile of Malice, that you have seen;
The bridesmaids were Misses Liar and Hate;
No best man was present, said to state.
Who is the groom? Who else can it be
But Gossip's true love, Sir Devil, he Whom she's revered all the days of her life.
All hail to Satan, and Gossip his wife!"—Century.

Phrases and Their Origin.

The phrase, "I acknowledge the corn," originated with a slave in the South. He was charged with stealing corn found in his possession. Having a sack with him he was also charged with stealing that. His reply was, "No, sir: I 'knowledge de corn, but I ain't gwtne to 'knowledge to de sack."

"Tipping the wink," generally regarded as a vulgar phrase, is to be found in a grave historical romance. It occurs in "Valerius; a Roman Story," by John Gibson Lockhart, Sir Walter Scott's son-in-law, and for many years editor of the Quarterly Review.

"Any color, so it's red," originated among the class of characters called Jakeys in the local drama. One of them, being on a committee appointed to procure a new fire engine, was asked what color the company desired the apparatus painted. He replied, "Why, any color, so it's red."

The origin of the phrase, "I can't see it," is traced to Lord Nelson, who, at the battle of Copenhagen, was told that a signal was given to cease firing and the direction pointed out to him. Seizing a telescope he applied it to his blind eye and exclaimed, "I can't see it."

"Hauling over the coals," dates six or seven centuries back, when feudal barons often used harsh methods of extracting gold from the rich Jews by suspending their victims above slow fires until they paid ransom or died. There is a scene of this in "Ivanhoe" in which the Templar endeavored to extort money from Isaac of York, the father of Rebecca.

"Barking up the wrong tree," is a very common expression in the West. It originated from the fact that a dog will bark at the foot of a particular tree to indicate to his master where the game is located. While endeavoring to see the animal he discovers it on another tree, and it finally escapes him altogether. In its application it denotes that a person has mistaken his object or is looking for it in the wrong place.

Anxious mothers often tell their handsome daughters that "beauty is but skin deep." The phrase probably originated with these two lines:

Beauty is but skin deep, and so doth fall
Short of those statues made of wood or stone, which occur in Rev. Robert Fleming's poem, published in 1691.

The term "blue stocking" was originally used in Venice about the year 1400, to designate literary classes by colors. In Mill's "History of Chivalry," we are told that members of the various academies were distinguished by the color of their stockings, blue being the prevailing color. The application of the term to women originated with Miss Hannah Moore's admirable description of a blue stocking club in her "Bas Bleu."

"Corporations have no souls" is a much older expression than most people imagine. It originated with Sir Edward Coke, who in the sixteenth century was considered one of the best legal writers of the age. He says, in one of his treatises: Corporations cannot commit trespass nor be outlawed, nor excommunicated, for they have no souls.

"Drowning the miller" originated from the following fact: If the mill stream below the mill is dammed or stopped, the water is ponded back and the mill becomes what the millers call tailed. If there is too much water the mill will not work, and the miller is said to be drowned out. Hence, when too much of any one article is put into a mixture it is called "drowning the miller."

There are a few such common sense proverbs as "Every man is the architect of his own fortune." Appian Cladius, a Roman censor, used it in a speech delivered by him 450 years before the Christian era.

"Better late than never" was used over 300 years ago by Thomas Tucker in his "Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry." Later on Bunyan used it in his "Pilgrims Progress."

Not a few of the phrases in use at this day originated with Lyly and are found in his "Euphues," a popular book published in 1580. Among them might be mentioned "caught napping," "a crooked stick or none," "brown study," "catching birds by putting salt on their tails," etc. When people do not particularly like each other it is sometimes said "there is no love lost between them." The phrase occurs in the old ballad of "The Babes in the Wood," and in a tale of the days of Shakespeare, entitled, "Montchensy."

Romance of the Alphabet.

Naturally the objects of nature first exercised the ingenuity of the Chinese depicitors of ideas. The heavenly bodies were always before them, and the hieroglyphics representing them were among their first efforts. But the time came when they were called upon to express on paper, by means of compound characters, the various phases of the sun and moon for example. The drawing of "the sun above a straight line" was sufficient to indicate the early dawn, and as it rose higher above the horizon and shone through the trees, it suggested an ideogram reproducing the scene (the sun shining through a tree) to represent the East. The "sun" and "to reign" compounded together was considered sufficiently descriptive of "the sun brightening into full day." The darkness before dawn was "the sun + not yet." As it sank toward the West it was a "shielded sun," and evening was an "escaped sun." For a description of "brightness" in the abstract the services of the moon were called into play, and the two luminaries placed side by side, represented very effectively the idea. But what about the stars? Their relative size supported the notion of their being the offspring of the sun, and so they were named "Born of the Sun." Descending to earth, we find that man and his concerns largely exercised the inventive powers of the elaborators of ideograms. "A man" and "two" stood for humanity and regard for one another. "A man's words" were truthful, sincere, and "half a man" was a companion, an idea of fellowship which seems to indicate that, according to Chinese ideas, a perfect man, like happiness, was born a twin. Etiquette or decorum was "the righteousness of man." A "white man" was a nobleman or chief, probably referring to a time when the Chinese were brought into contact with the darker-skinned aboriginal tribes of China, and a "valley man" was one of the common herd. "A man's fault" was dissipation, as it often is here as well as in China, and a woman's hesitation and uncertainty; while extravagance was represented by a symbol signifying "a man's excess," and wantonness a "woman's." It has to be admitted that the characters drawn of women in the ideograms are by no means always complimentary, which, of course, must be attributed to a complete ignorance of the sex on the part of inventors of writing. How else can we explain the facts that a compound of "two women" represents strife, and of "three" intrigues? Or, again, that to suspect, to dislike, should find expression in a character composed of "a woman" plus "together with;" or that saucy, pert, should be represented by a "more-over woman." It is curious to note that an ideogram formed of "a wave" and "a woman" stands for a virago, just as a wave-man, or Ronin, in Japanese, means a lawless adventurer. The idea of beauty among the Chinese differs as widely from ours as do their written characters from our A B C. Not long since a member of the Chinese legation was looking at a photographic group of decidedly pretty young English ladies, and being asked whether he admired them, replied, "No, they are difficult to look at, difficult to look at." As to figure, a willow-like waist, and a bending, yielding form are the objects of highest admiration in China, and so a character formed of parts signifying "a woman" and "curved" is used to denote beautiful, lovely, comely. Many meanings connected with women are associated with characters which prima facie bear no relation to them whatever. —London Saturday Review.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

One or two other old comedies will be added to the Jefferson-Florence repertoire next season.

Marie Wainwright will present for the first time Twelfth Night in San Francisco, February 23d.

Henry Irving, the English actor, was born in Keinton, England, in 1838; Adelina Patti in Madrid in 1843, and Lillian Russell in Clinton, Iowa, in 1860.

The story of A Mile a Minute, in which Minnie Palmer will appear shortly, deals with the adventures of a young actress. One of the scenes will be a reproduction of the famous Argyle Rooms in London.

M. B. Curtis will begin a tour with Sam'l of Posen under the direction of Gustave Kahn. "Sam'l" has made two fortunes already for Mr. Curtis. A new play is in preparation by a well-known journalist for the comedian.

Lawrence Barrett writes a Chicago friend that "Gan-elon has pleased a few, but has not been a great popular financial success. My next work will be Tennyson's Becket, which I shall produce for the first time in Chicago in October next."

The new play, The Power of the Press, to be produced at the Star Theater, by Augustus Pitou, in March, is a story of New York life, and does not, as the title might suggest, introduce any scenes of newspaper offices, or any reporters or editors. Its motive is to show the power of the newspaper press in bringing hidden mysteries to life.

There are reports from London that Mrs. Alice Shaw, the whistler, not only failed to make a hit in St. Petersburg, but caught a decided frost there. Her reception was quite disheartening. No dates had been booked for her, and the local managers were skeptical of her ability to charm an audience. To cap the climax, her pianist left the company and returned to England. Mrs. Shaw also met with financial loss in Berlin.

It is not generally known, but it is none the less true, that Archibald C. Gunther's play, Mr. Potter of Texas, was ready for stage production long before Mr. Barnes of New York was conceived, and was actually cast at the Madison Square Theater during the regime of the Frohman Brothers there. Frank W. Sanger will produce the play at the Star Theater, February 2d, with one of the best companies seen in New York this season.

The desire for realism in stage presentations is still rampant. In Noah's Ark, a new local melodrama which brings old Josh Hart once more into the field of theatricals, a realistic fire scene will be introduced, supplemented by the novel introduction of "shooting the life line," a new feature in the life-saving apparatus of the Metropolitan Fire Brigade. Brooklyn Bridge, City Hall and the new Pulitzer World building will be among the scenic novelties of the new piece, which will receive its initial presentation at Niblo's after the end of the pantomime season, a week from Saturday.

"Well, what did you think of the play to-night?" Advance Agent of Hugger Mugger Combination—"Not so bad; some good lines in it, but rather slow, don't you know, take it altogether. You might have livened it up a bit by having Ophelia, in the mad scene, appear in tights, and you'd oughter worked in a song and dance act in the ghost scene. And then think what a sensation you might have created by having an Amazonian march in the graveyard business! If you'd have the thing fixed into shape I ain't so sure but the Hugger Mugger troupe might be induced to take it into their repertory. They'd make the fortune of the author if they'd take hold of it."—Boston Transcript.

The last engagement of Edwin Forrest began on February 6, 1871, in the Fourteenth Street Theater, New York, during which he played "Lear" and "Richelieu." Illness compelled him to retire. Three weeks before his death, which occurred in Philadelphia on December 12, 1872, he appeared in Steinway Hall, in New York, as a reader of "Hamlet" and "Othello." He died of apoplexy. Forrest was born in Philadelphia on March 9, 1806. His father was Scotch, his mother of German birth. He married in 1837 Catherine Norton Sinclair, daughter of John Sinclair, the English singer. Mrs. Forrest obtained a divorce from her husband on the ground of infidelity, and was decreed an allowance of $3,000 a year as alimony.

William Mestayer, one of the two "Babes" in the pantomime of Babes in the Wood at Niblo's, withdraws from the cast at the end of the New York engagement. The management intend to replace him with a certain Thespian, confessed to be the leanest, tallest, lankest and most hungry-looking being connected with the stage of this country. This will make a nice contrast to the 350 pounds of avoirdupois known as George K. Fortescue. The pantomime has proven so successful at Niblo's that Manager Gilmore has been encouraged to negotiate for the production at his house next season of Beauty and the Beast, the latest London pantomime, and one declared by the London critics to be the grandest offering of its character ever presented at historic old Drury Lane Theater.

The English Thespian is a frequent figure in the Broadway promenade on fine afternoons. E. S. Willard, who, unlike the majority of stars, looks quite like his lithographs, attracts general attention by his striking personality and the unutterable sadness of his mien. The Ancient Mariner was a person of riotously joyous aspect compared to Mr. Willard. He never smiles, and stalks through the crowd with lack lustre eye, seemingly having no interest whatever in earthly affairs. His attire would make the average fashionable green with envy. Willard "goes in" for walking, and shortly before he left England to fill his present engagement here took a stroll over the 300 miles that lay between London and Land's End, with no companion but a collie dog bearing the remarkable name of "Quiddles."

"I never have to really study any more," said M. A. Kennedy. "We have so many rehearsals that the lines seem to come of their own accord. When one has been on the stage for the greater part of his life, the memorizing of lines is practically nothing, and that is one reason, I think, that the old-timers are in such demand. In the old days we often had to play six or seven new parts in a week, and were of necessity quick studies. I don't think one of our younger actors could get up in a big part on a few hours' notice, as we often had to. Long runs are doing away with a chance to study a great deal, and it is to be regretted. As for my own method of procedure, it is very simple. I rehearse until I know the part and business thoroughly, and there you are. I think it is a great mistake to become letter perfect in a part until nearly before the production. I recall an incident which will illustrate my meaning. When we began rehearsals for A Possible Case, at Clarendon Hall, there was a young actor in the cast who shall be nameless. He came to the first rehearsal knowing every line of his part. The rest of the cast read their parts, and continued to do so for about three weeks. By that time the stage business had been definitely settled, and we all knew our lines except the young man, who had to fit his business to his lines, instead of his lines to his business. The result was that he had to learn his part all over again, much to our amusement."—N. Y. World.

Book Chat.

The Queen of Roumania's novel, "Deficit," is a story of England, and has not a few interesting pictures of English social life.

It doesn't pay to do much talking when you're mad enough to choke,
Because the word that stings the deepest is the one that's never spoke;
Let the other fellow wrangle till the storm has blown away,
Then he'll do a heap of thinking about the things you didn't say.

George Eliot, it is said, disliked Lewis Carroll's imitable "Alice in Wonderland" on the ground that it laughed at things which children have a kind of belief in. Without going so far as that, it may be conceded that there is a certain cruelty about a parody. Even the best and wittiest parody "takes the bloom off" the thing it burlesques.

In our existing literature "The Circuit Rider," "The Hoosier Schoolmaster," the stories of Charles Egbert Craddock and of the new coterie of Southern writers, the California tales of Bret Harte, the optimistic and kindly philosophy of Emerson—all these are American, far more American than anything which Mr. Howells has given us. They are American because they could not have been conceived or written in any social atmosphere except that which is found in this country of personal freedom and absolute independence.

"The Babes in the Wood," it is generally believed, was a "disguised recital" of the reported murder of his young nephews by Richard III., there being a marked resemblance to several leading facts connected with the King named, and his brother's children, as well as a singular coincidence between many expressions in the poetical legend and the historical details of the time. Among other evidence adduced in the appendix to Halstead's "Life of Richard III" is that of a rude representation of a male deer surmounting the black-letter copy of the ballad at Cambridge; a hind, or female deer, being the badge of the unfortunate Edward V.

From the St. James Gazette we clip the following: Miss Marie Coraelli sends us the following list of English novels as they appear printed in the Circulating Library Catalogue at Vevey, Switzerland: Kavanagh's "Leven Years and Other Thales," "Too Strange Not to Be Two," Dicken's "Skatches," Mrs. Hoey's "Golde Sorron," Black's "She-adventures of a Phaython," Trollope's "He Kne He Was Rigt," Mrs. Craik's "His Littl Mother and Other Skethes," Mrs. Marshall's "Life's Aftermatch," Forbes's "Sod-iering and Scribbing," Motley's "Gance at the Pabst of English Literatur," Bret Harte's "Tarradiddle Bosson," "Notes From the Pockit-booh of an O. J. Um-eeter," "Confessions," "Aho Creaks-pay" ("He Who Breaks, Pays"), "How to Be Lappy Ahough Marrier" ("How to Be Happy Though Married").

Mr. Lowell has never written anything more characteristic or better in its way than his introduction to Milton's "Areopagitica," printed by the Grolier Club for its members. Mr. Lowell compares Milton's prose and verse to the disparagement of the former, but it is a disparagement founded only on his own accomplishment. Whatever Milton was as a poet, he was not far behind it as a writer of vigorous prose; and gentle as poets are supposed to be by nature, this one could strike very hard blows with his pen. "In contest with an adversary he was brutally willing to strike below the belt," says Mr. Lowell, "and shows as little magnanimity or fairness as the average editor of an American newspaper in dealing with a political opponent." The book is printed in the best style of Grolier Club art, and after 325 copies left the press the type was distributed, and the book, which cost original subscribers $6 a copy, is now scarce at $15, and yet it is only a small 12mo. bound in plain boards.

The seri-comic poems of S. W. Foss are known wherever the English language is spoken, and yet who knows anything about S. W. Foss himself? He is the son of a farmer, and was born in Candia, N. H., June 19, 1858. He worked on the farm until fifteen, and then he went to the Portsmouth high school. He worked his way through Brown University at Providence, standing very near one end of his class—which end he positively refuses to state. At any rate he was class poet. From 1883 to 1886 he was editor of the Lynn Saturday Union, and it was while on that paper that he originated the so-called long-tailed style of poetry, which consists of enormously long lines and long words. For a year after leaving the Union he worked as a free lance and wrote humorous verses for every comic paper in the land. He wrote three or four poems a day, never less than two, and his work displayed a wonderful amount of originality. In August, 1887, he became editor of the Yankee Blade of Boston.

Professional Chat.

A St. Louis minister talked two and a half hours Sunday on the "brevity of life." After the janitor had awakened the congregation, several five-second remarks were made on the absence of brevity in sermons.

Judge Holmes, son of Oliver Wendell Holmes, is said to be the only Justice on the Supreme bench of Massachusetts, who really enjoys writing out an opinion. Some of our Justices seem to enjoy lengthening out opinions, if they don't enjoy the writing.

Some preachers put their listeners asleep with dreamy discourses, but the Rev. David Kauffman, of Indiana, reverses this, and puts himself asleep while in the pulpit. While apparently asleep and unconscious, it is said that he delivers sermons of amazing eloquence.

It is not often that a lawyer receives other recognition of his services in behalf of a client than a retainer and fee. The feeling of most people when they get through with a member of the legal fraternity is more akin to sorrow than gratitude. A Court-street attorney has had a contrary experience. One of his clients, an Irish woman, who had been indicted several times, but never convicted, for keeping a kitchen barroom in the West End, dropped in on him yesterday with a Christmas present. It was a handsome silk muffler. "But you've already paid me, Marv," said the lawyer. "Niver mind, sor," she replied, "but tuck it around your foine throat an' kape your tongue glib, for, be-gorra, I may made thim agin."—Boston Traveller.

There was a famous cat at Christchurch. This was the Common Room cat. This room was, of course, sacred to dons, but when a man took his bachelor's, his tutor generally asked him to wine in the Common Room. There, if he were lucky, he might hear Osborne Gordon come out with some of his wit and wisdom. He might also view a process which attested both the agility of the cat and the agility of the human subject. Above the fireplace was a mantelpiece, and above the mantelpiece a bust of the venerable Dr. Dusby, and above the bust a bracket on the wall. The don would stand before the fireplace, and, with a dexterous jerk would toss up a biscuit, which would alight on the bracket. Pussy would bound to the mantelpiece, then to the bald head of the venerable Busby, and finally to the bracket. It was cleverly done, both by the cat and don, but the chief credit of the gymnastic feat was supposed to remain with the cat. There was one man of long standing who was very fond of mice, which used to reside in his pockets and run freely about his clothes. Any person in the pursuit of natural history would be pardoned in the college that owned Frank Buckland as a student, whose remarkable performances that way will long be a tradition at Oxford.—Temple Bar.

In nature there is no such thing as chance. Chance is an invention of man, and permeates through all the affairs of life. The commercial man has chance embodied in much of his business. In fact, in all vocations there are elements of chance. We all have to take chances in this game of life.

There are people who are never satisfied or contented, no matter how smooth is life's pathway. The Weekly Shasta Courier is about to enter its fortieth volume. It was established in March, 1852, and is one of the oldest papers in the State. It was started when Shasta county was a land of gold. It was ever an exponent of the best interests of the community in which it is published, and is one of our most valued exchanges.

There is no end to the artfulness of woman-kind. There comes a story from Ridgway, Pa., to the effect that a man there, while blowing smoke rings in the presence of a young lady, was surprised to see her run her finger in one and tell him we'll be married next spring. What could the poor fellow do or say except to bow his head in meek submission.

From the Georgetown Gazette we learn that mining has received a new impetus upon that divide. A mine has been recently discovered which promises to become the most valuable mining property in California. There are hundreds of good mines in El Dorado county that will be developed into good paying property during the present year.

The Marysville Appeal issued a citrus fair edition of that paper that would have done credit to any metropolitan journal. It contained many valuable and interesting articles descriptive of Northern California, several well executed engravings and an elegant map of the "Sunny Valley of the Sacramento." The Appeal is abreast of the times.

According to the report of the Director of the Mint, the precious metals received at the mints and assay offices of the United States during the fiscal year 1890, aggregated in value $92,793,958, an increase of $2,436,055 over the deposits of the preceding fiscal year. There were 2,521,361 ounces of gold of a coining value of $46,909,041, and 65,293,056 ounces of silver of a coining value of $75,977,373 operated upon in the coining department alone, and the total quantity operated upon in the mints and assay offices aggregated 240 tons of gold and 4,817 tons of silver.

The value of the operative wastage and loss on sale of sweeps was $26,141.05, while the incidental gains in the operations on bullion were valued at $36,683.87, leaving a net gain in the operations of the Mint during the year of $10,542.82.

A reformed ex-convict, who has had years of experience in both the private and government detective services, contrasts the two classes and says: "A private detective makes it his business to encourage crime, while the government detective is not allowed to put any inducements to commit crime before a criminal." There are of course exceptions to the rule, but the mushroom army of private detectives must have some way of making records.

We have lived in this State for lo! these many, many years; so long, indeed, that really we thought we knew the names of all the Governors of California from the first to the present incumbent. But until last week we never knew that among that galaxy of greatness there was one named Norton. However, while reading a late number of the new evening paper, in an article entitled "California's Art Gallery," which treated of the portraits of the Governors that are to be found hanging in the Capitol, and in that part which speaks of the pictures that are in the Assembly Chamber, after mentioning that of the last Mexican Governor, Michel-torna, the reporter says: "On the right the shadows of the recesses are lighted up by the jolly, cheery, robust figure of Gov. Norton." Now the only prominent man of California bearing that name was Judge Norton, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the State, who was on the bench in the early sixties. But the spirit of honest old John Bigler is as forgiving as he was when in the flesh.

There has been some talk of a bill during this session of the Legislature to appropriate money to paint the portrait of ex-acting Governor Waterman to be hung in the Capitol with others of the ex-Governors. It is a commendable and a laudable proposition, and one that should not meet a single vote in opposition. R. W. Waterman departed from the Governor's chair leaving behind him a trail of official misfortunes and mishaps, which are much to be regretted, such as never before cursed a State or soiled its ensign armorial. His career of three years of misrule will be reverted to, in time to come, as the people of Ireland are now accustomed to look back to the days of Lord Norbury of the beginning of this century; not as a three years when the Governor caused the shedding of so much blood that "if it was gathered together in one reservoir his Excellency might swim in it," as was said of Norbury by the martyred patriot Emmet, but will be spoken and thought and written of as a non-descript administration of State affairs that could never again be repeated in any other State, simply because another Waterman could no where else be found—the mould was broken after he was framed—and not in California, for she will profit by the example. But he was Governor of the State; albeit a providential interposition necessitated the unnatural freak, and as one of her Governors, the State cannot afford to prove churlish or sullen, and simply to be vindictive or revengeful, refuse to have his portrait painted, by way of punishment to him for his transgressions. Fancy a great, a magnanimous State like California heaping coals of fire on the old man's head in his fast closing years by gratuitously insulting him in a refusal to acknowledge—as much as could thus be done—that he was once Governor. Besides, truth to tell, the unfortunate man was sadly imposed on by those he had taken to his bosom and warned into unworthy prominence in recognition for kindnesses done him before he became Governor.

The Diaphanous Test of Death.

It has been recently stated that a prize offered years ago for the discovery of some means whereby the inexperienced might at once determine whether in a given case death had or had not occurred, had been won by a physician, who had discovered that if a light were placed behind the hand of a supposed dead person a scarlet tint would be apparent where the fingers touched each other if life was not extinct, and that if no red glow was visible death had taken place.

Dr. W. B. Richardson has written an essay in which he states that although this test has its value, it is not by any means to be trusted as an unfailing indication of life or death. He gives the case of a person in a state of syncope to whom the test was most carefully applied. Not the faintest sign of red coloration between the fingers could be traced, yet the recovery of the syncope was complete and was affected without any artificial aid. Dr. Richardson regards it as a good test, but is of opinion that certain proofs are: The pulsation, the respiratory murmur, pressure on veins, the electric test for muscular irritability, the ammonia hypodermic test, coagulation of blood in the veins; rigor mortis and decomposition.

Agricultural Education.

The object of education is two-fold. First—The development, expansion and cultivation of the intellectual powers. Second—To prepare man for the practical duties of life; to fit him to pursue the avocation of his choice, whatever it may be, intelligently and profitably. And there is no branch of human industry in which science can do more than in agriculture. There is none that requires such an extensive and various application of scientific truth. It is true, the earth will bring forth its fruits, after a fashion, without the aid of science. Experience and observation, to a very limited extent, may perform the office of study and research, properly and efficiently directed. Yet they are but a poor substitute. A virgin soil, not exhausted by the use of years, may yield to the cultivator a profitable income. But we must recollect that our country will grow old; continued cropping, in the process of time, will render the best of our soils sterile and unproductive. It becomes necessary, therefore, that this decay of vitality should be stayed, by calling in science to our aid. It will not answer the purpose that this be done in isolated cases—that there shall be here and there a farmer educated up to the point where he is made fully capable of applying scientific truths to his avocation. But the great body should be thoroughly educated—should become familiar with all exact sciences that have any application to agriculture. We see now a vast difference between the educated farmer, and he who plods along in the good old ways of his forefathers. All around the former are evidences of prosperity. His profits, enhanced by the application of science, are larger, and enable him to surround himself with all that convenience or taste may prompt. The other labors on—each succeeding year finds him where its predecessor left him, and after the toils of a long life, he has made but little progress—for his industry has been applied in such a manner as to secure the smallest results.

Our object is the practical application of scientific knowledge to all the purposes of life. And here we meet a difficulty in the minds of some. There are those who are under an impression that science is something for the closet, and that scientific men cannot be practical men by any possibility. Nothing can be more at war with facts than this idea. The truth is, that science is essentially practical in its very nature. For what else is true science, but a knowledge of facts—a knowledge of the real constitution, relations, and capabilities of things? How can it possibly be true, that the more thoroughly a man knows the nature of the materials on which he is to act, and of the instruments by which he is to produce results, the less confident he is to do anything successfully? Such an opinion is so absurd, that one would hardly know how to characterize a person seriously maintaining it. As if a man blindfolded and groping in the dark, were more likely to give his efforts a right direction than one whose eyes were open in the clear light of day.

What makes the successful lawyer so efficient in his profession? It is because he has spent years of time and thousands of dollars in making himself thoroughly acquainted with all its principles and details. Let a man attempt to pursue the profession who is ignorant of law, and he would of course fail. Let him be but slightly acquainted with it, and his business and his profits would be small. So in regard to the other professions, and the mechanical trades. Those engaged in them must know how to do the work before they can do it. Why should it be different in the case of the farmer? It is true, almost any man can plant a potato, or a field of corn, and may possibly get a fair crop, even if ignorant of the first principles of any science. But the soil must be favorable or he cannot. If it refuse to yield its nutrition and cause the grain to grow, he cannot compel it. The only alternative left for him is to abandon it. But let him be versed in scientific agriculture and the difficulty vanishes. Perverse soils yield readily, and obey his commands. Science unlocks their treasures and they pour them forth, and the cultivator is enriched. The time has come when he must understand his business, and be able to give a reason for what he does. The field will retaliate his neglect or abuse, by withholding the rich products which he might otherwise secure; and the sterile aspect of many a farm in the older portions of our country—once rich and productive—furnishes a proof, both of the violence which has been offered to nature, and the retributive vengeance with which she resents the abuse of her generous prerogatives. This demand for mechanical skill, for an intimate acquaintance with the laws and resources of nature, and the plain instructions of a rational and practical philosophy, is increasing upon us every year and every day. It is our duty to meet it. We must meet it, in order to secure increasing and permanent prosperity. We should encourage the desire, and furnish the means by which to gratify the aspirations of those who wish to become masters of whatever pursuit or calling in life they may choose to select.

A Complete Success.

About five hundred guests assembled in the hall of the Bainbridge Business College Friday evening to witness the drama, The Flowing Bowl under the management of Miss Mamie Bainbridge, the teacher of elocution in the College. The cast of the drama was as follows: Martin Moore, Mr. Calderwood; Major Fitzpatrick, Mr. Roberts; Herbert Poole, Mr. Cutts; Clifton Jerome, Mr. Vanderbilt; Richard Bell, Mr. Miller; Chas. Wilkins, Mr. Nourse; Pete, Mr. Williams; Marion Moore, Miss Goode; Mrs. Morris, Miss Stauffer; Jessie Morris, Miss Greenlaw. The parts were made up of pupils of Miss Bainbridge, and a very creditable performance was given. Miss Bainbridge deserves great credit for the manner in which the play was presented. Special mention should be made of Miss Stauffer, her part being a very difficult one, who was not only good but excellent; Miss Greenlaw as Jessie Morris could not have been better had she been a professional, as was also the part of Miss Goode. The gentlemen were all good in their respective parts and reflect great credit on their instructress. Mr. Roberts as Major Fitzpatrick was a complete success, and should he ever aspire to the stage, he need not hesitate to apply for a stand as an Irish comedian. Space will not allow of a mention of all that took part; suffice it to say that taking into consideration that they were all on the stage for the first time, they were one and all good and presented their parts well.

The entertainment opened with a recitation by Miss Lumie Wise, "A Shadow on the Blind," and was rendered in an admirable manner; another by Miss Hattie Norsworthy, entitled "Getting Photographed." The masterpiece, however, was left for Miss Annie Laurie, a recitation, "The Double Sacrifice," followed by a tableau in which she is burned to a stake as a sacrifice. Miss Laurie has the gift to make a splendid elocutionist and one to be appreciated by all.

After the programme had been completed, the guests adjourned to the spacious school of the College, where dancing was indulged in until an early hour in the morning.

Many were the praises and thanks sent both to Miss Mamie and Prof. J. C. Bainbridge, for the enjoyable time had. The entertainment will be long remembered by the citizens present, and 'tis to be hoped that Miss Bainbridge will favor us with another ere long.

Legal Notices.

Assemblyman Clark, of Yolo, has introduced the following bill, which should become a law: "Whenever it becomes necessary to the proper determination of any action or proceeding mentioned in this Code, that any summons, order, notice, or other matter shall be published in any newspaper, it shall be the duty of the presiding Judge of such Court, and the duty of the Clerk thereof, in which such action or proceeding is pending, when practicable, to be governed by the request of the person or persons who are primarily liable to pay the cost of such publication of such summons, order, notice, or other matter, and to cause the same to be published in such newspaper as such person may designate; provided, such newspaper be a weekly or daily newspaper regularly published, and of general circulation in the county where such action or proceeding is pending."

Views of a Pessimistic Scientist.

A decidedly gloomy view of the future of America is taken by Professor Otis Mason, of the Smithsonian Institute. Within a century he declares, the western hemisphere will be exhausted as a support for civilized man, and will be relegated to the dominion of savages of a very low order. He says, "the so-called American people have camped over the continent regardless of their future. They have delved into the soil, chopped into the mountains, and used up the land until there stares them in the face the almost immediate prospect of starvation."

Open Letter.

SACRAMENTO, January 28, 1891.

Actual experience develops all that has ever been claimed for the Mathushek pianos. Over five years ago I purchased one of the upright Mathushek pianos from John F. Cooper. During all that period it has never required tuning but once, and that was occasioned by removal. The tone is superior, and seems to improve, like old wine, with age. It is true, I take exceptionally good care of the instrument, but the genuine merit is there. Experts and music teachers inform me that my piano is a gem. I prize it very highly. MRS. W. A. ANDERSON.

Song Writing.

In speaking of the songs of Heine, of Beranger and Burns we have remarked that the motif—sentimental, patriotic, or passionate—which started any song should run simply down to the last line. Otherwise, indeed, the composition almost ceases to be a song in the modern sense of the word, and becomes an ode—an ode not only as the word was understood by the Greeks, but as it was understood by Horace, and in still later times by Coleridge, Shelley and Keats. This oneness of motif, which is the fundamental characteristic of the song, goes far, perhaps, to explain the fact that in most songs the really vital portion consists of but one stanza—often the first—from which the remainder of the lyric hangs as a mere fringe. Among the exquisite song-writers of the seventeenth century Shakespeare was one of those who knew when to stop after the motif had been fully expressed; for it must be remembered that the stanza which mars the divine song in Measure for Measure, "Take, Oh, Take Those Lips Away," is not Shakespeare's at all, but Fletcher's. After Shakespeare's time, however, some of the best English songs written until Tennyson rose have been the work of those who are called "minor poets"—that is to say, poets who have made no attempt to "build the lofty rhyme," while often those who have indulged in that risky kind of architecture have only partially succeeded in the humbler efforts of the song-writer. When a large body of the poetic stream is at the command of the writer, the very magnitude of the forces at work perhaps makes it difficult for him to restrain them for the single expression of a single motif. But even unity of motive is not enough to lend full vitality to a song. Extreme brevity of structure is a primary requisite even where the motif has not been departed from. To all forms of literary art Voltaire's maxim applies, that the most effective way to weary the listener is to say all that can be said upon a subject; but this volubility is destructive of the very existence of the song. In a word, it is here that is seen more clearly than in any other department of poetic art the imperious truth of Hesiod's saying that the half is better than the whole; it is here that literary self-indulgence—always more or less injurious to literary art—is seen to be fatal. This could easily be made manifest, if it were worth while to instance any one of those fine, but half forgotten lyrics of our time, which nothing would have prevented from passing into universal acceptance had not the poet's embarrassment of wealth tempted him into saying "everything that could be said upon the subject in haud."—London Athenaeum.

A laborer at the Dundee harbor lately told his wife on awakening in the morning a curious dream which he had during the night. He dreamed that he saw coming toward him in single file four rats. The first one was very fat, and was followed by two lean ones, the rear rat being blind. The dreamer was greatly troubled, as there is a superstition among the ignorant that to dream of rats forbodes calamity. He appealed to his wife concerning this, but she could not interpret the ill-omened dream. His son, a sharp lad, who had heard his father's story, volunteered to be the interpreter. "The fat rat," he said, "is the man who keeps the public house that ye gang to see often, and the two lean ones are me and my mother, and the blind one is yourself, father."

DRAMATIC NOTES.

Geo. F. Marion will visit the Pacific Coast next season in Mr. Maccaroni, a new and original farce-comedy creation in Italian dialect. Geo. Marion has made himself famous in Italian dialect. It is said he will be supported by a strong company of comedians.

The Woods & Steen Mystifying Combination have done a good business this week. The Steens are wonders, and have performed some surprising tricks. So clever are these artists that they defy detection. Edna puzzles the audience and sends it away "guessing" how she does it. There will be a change of programme to-night, which will be the final performance.

Donnelly and Girard, with a revision of Natural Gas, will soon be presented at the Metropolitan. There are some new faces in the company, notably a very capricious little woman, Milly Price-Dow, whose escapades have made her somewhat of a famous character. She is a high kicker. We noticed that both Donnelly and Girard were very hoarse from severe colds when we saw them at the Bush last week.

There were some violent scenes in Paris this week on the production of Sardon's new play, Thermidor. It is a drama founded on the scenes at the time of the fall of Robespierre, and arouses the sensitive nature of the French to such an extent that they take sides and want to fight the battle over again. This event will have the effect to make Thermidor a grand success when produced on this side the ocean. If nothing else, it will be a prime advertisement in America.

The McNeill Club is in active training for the production of the very popular opera of Pinafore, it being the intention to present the same without calling to their aid the services of any professionals, hoping thereby to render a much more pleasing and, certainly, a much more enjoyable operatic entertainment. Heretofore in producing operas the club has had to undergo a very heavy outlay, and as a result of their endeavors to please the families of Sacramento by giving them really first-class amusement, they find that the drain on the members' private funds, not to speak of the loss of time and sacrifice of personal comforts in attending rehearsals, etc., has been altogether too onerous, and they now find themselves compelled to call upon the good people of Sacramento and "her sisters, and her cousins, and her aunts," to aid them in their efforts to make of Pinafore a financial success, and at the same time avail themselves of the opportunity of enjoying a short season of very popular music. The particulars as to date, caste, etc., will shortly be announced.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to DAVID KIZER, greeting: You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 29th day of January, 1891, in which action, Annie Kizer is plaintiff, and you are defendant. That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To obtain a decree of said Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now and heretofore existing between plaintiff and defendant on the grounds of desertion and failure to provide; also, for the care, custody and control of the minor children, the issue of said marriage, viz: Nettie and Edna, aged 5 years, and 15 months respectively, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made; and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand [SEAL.] and affix the seal of said Court, this 29th day of January A. D. 1891.

Giving a Professor "Hell."

It was in one of the smaller of the New England colleges that on one occasion the students of a graduating class showed their fondness for a favorite professor by the gift of a handsome edition of Dore's illustrated "Inferno," says the Boston Courier. The gift was a surprise, but there were, of course, a number of people in the secret, and among them was the brother of the professor's wife. He chanced to meet his sister on the morning when the book was to be presented, the occasion being the last recitation which the class were to have to the professor.

"Oh, Kate," he said, with a great affectation of concern, "do you know what is going on?"

"Going on!" she echoed. "No; I know of nothing in particular. What is it?"

"Do you think you could keep your husband home from recitation this morning?"

"Keep him at home! Why should I keep him at home?"

"I don't want to frighten you," the other said, with a sinister air, "but the truth is—"

"The truth is what?" she demanded. "What in the world is the matter?"

"Well, if you must know," he said "the boys are just going to give him 'hell' this morning."

The professor's wife was so alarmed by his words and manner that she forgot to reprove him for his apparent profanity.

"Why, I thought the students liked him."

Her brother shook his head gloomily.

"You will find it as I say," he observed, and turned away. "I don't think there is anything you can do," he called back over his shoulder.

The lady flew home in a panic and not long after she reached it her husband arrived, bringing with him "Hell," elegantly bound. What the feelings of the lady toward her brother were may be imagined by any one who has been similarly placed.

The recent exposure of a fraudulent divorce mill in New York is another strong argument in favor of a National Divorce law. A similar institution was unearthed in Brooklyn several years ago, and probably there are more of them now engaged in wrecking homes and ruining lives. There is a class of lawyers making a specialty of divorce business, who are a disgrace to the legal profession, and it would seem that the bar associations in big cities could do an excellent service to humanity by adopting some means that would enable the public to gain a clearer idea of the individual status of the men practising law in the territory more or less under their jurisdiction. New York lawyers are complaining of the laxity with which men are admitted to the bar in that state, and the same protest has been made, with equal reason, in other sections. Fortunately for Boston, the Suffolk bar standard is much higher to-day than in years gone by, and the tendency is to elevate it still further.

There was a titled British buccaneer, who was born about 1637, and who died in Jamaica in 1690. His name was Sir Henry Morgan. The son of a farmer in Wales, he became a sailor, and was one of the most noted pirates who infested the West India Islands. He amassed a large fortune and was knighted by Charles II.

August Belmont's Superstitions.

The late August Belmont once told a New York correspondent on the Mounmouth race track that his horses would not win because a flock of blackbirds had crossed his path that morning.

"I saw the blackbirds in the field," he related, "and said to myself, 'if they fly across I shall lose.' So I walked my team carefully—carefully. But no! Just as I came opposite the birds flew in front of me, wheeled about and crossed me again. I shall not go to the stables. I have sent for my trainer to tell him it is of no use trying to win to-day."

At another time he was in radiant spirits because a little bird had flown into his bath-room and allowed itself to be fed.

"I shall have good luck," he exclaimed. "Wait and you shall see."

That day he won three principal races. Indeed, a curious phase of his superstitions was that they generally turned out to be correct. When he felt that he was going to lose he did lose; when he imagined he would win he did win.

This may be explained by coincidence or by the fact that his trainer and jockey were shrewd enough to humor his whims, knowing that he would rather justify his superstitions than capture a race. But, whatever the explanation, the fact that such a man should be subject to such caprices is wonderful.

"Coining" jokes is a very common figure of speech, but we know of only one instance in which the joke was actually coined—that is stuck upon a graven die, and issued from a legal mint. The fact is historical and is as follows: In the year 1679 the Danes advanced with a large force upon Hamburg, but after a siege of considerable duration, seeing but little hope of ultimate success, they finally withdrew and marched back. Thereupon the Hamburgers caused a medal to be struck in commemoration of the event. On one side of the numismatic curiosity was the inscription: "The King of Denmark came before Hamburg. What he gained will be seen on the other side." On the other side there was a total blank.—Buffalo Commercial.

A gentleman was looking at a suite of rooms in an apartment house; he found them satisfactory and said to the janitor: "I'll take them." "Have you any children, sir?" "Yes, two." "Then I cannot let you the rooms." "Why, my children are both married and live in Iowa." "That makes no difference. My orders are not to take in any tenant who has children."

A SCARED EDITOR.

A rugged farmer stalked into the sanctum with a big whip under his arm. "Be you the editor?" "I am," was the half apprehensive reply.

"Here's two dollars—send me your paper, for life," he said.

"You see," he went on, "our daughter was sick and like to die; she drooped and grew weak and pale, had headaches, no appetite, back ached, hands and feet like ice, couldn't sleep, hacked with cough, and we thought she had consumption. No medicine helped her until she tried that Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription mentioned in your paper, when she began to mend in no time and is now well and handsome as a rose—put me down as a life subscriber."

Now the editor is looking for another scare. The medicine has cured thousands afflicted as was the farmer's daughter, restoring the female functions to healthy action, and removing the obstructions and suppressions which caused her trouble. It is guaranteed to give satisfaction in every case, or price ($1.00) refunded. It's a legitimate medicine, not a beverage. Contains no alcohol to inebriate; no syrup or sugar to sour or ferment in the stomach and derange digestion.

Good Bye.

Farewell, my friend, since we must part,
It matters not the reason why,
With laughing lips and aching heart,
I say good-by.

If you can smile, why I smile, too;
I gauge my sadness by your own;
I cannot show more grief and pain
Than you have shown.

Since I am nothing in your life,
From henceforth I shall vainly try
To banish thought of you from mine,
And so, good-by.

Requiescat in Pace.

De Mille, the playwright, was dining with a party of gentlemen a few evenings ago, when one of the number, who had taken more wine than was good for his wits, became obnoxiously talkative. Efforts were made in many delicate ways to call the offender to order, but they seemed only to incite him to increased chatter. Finally, when it became apparent that the party must either put a stop to the foolish fellow's talk, or take an adjournment, Mr. De Mille turned to him and asked if he had heard the latest parrot story. The gabbler said he had not.

"You won't take offense if I tell it?"
"How can I?" asked the victim, innocently.

"Assure me that you will not think I mean to make any personal application, and I will tell it," said the dramatist.

"Of course I won't," and the offender gave the floor and his eager attention to Mr. De Mille.

"Well," said the playwright, "the parrot sat upon his perch in one corner of the room. A bull-dog, a new-comer in the household, lay in another corner."

"S-s-sick 'em," said the parrot, 's-s-sick 'em, Tige!"

"The new dog bounded to his feet and looked for something to seek, but finding nothing, lay down again."

"The parrot clambered down from his perch and waddled across to where the dog was lying."

"S-s-sick 'em, Tige," he said again.

"This time Tige found something to seek. He pounced upon the parrot, tore him, shook him and boxed him about until the poor bird was well nigh dead. When the dog had been called off the parrot labored up to his perch, looked about the floor where his beautiful feathers lay scattered, scanned himself minutely, noted his one remaining tail feather and said:

"I know what's the matter with me; I talk too blamed much."

The dinner went on without further interruption. The preparatory denial of personal application had done its work, and done it delicately and well.—Analostan Magazine.

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
J. H. MILLER, Managing Editor.

Last week the Judiciary Committee of the Senate recommended to that body the passage of proposed constitutional amendment No. 8. This shows that there are fearful assaults on the fundamental law. And eight is not the total number of attempts to better that instrument. But let us look at No. 8 for a moment. Its purpose is to make a Board of Pardons, for convicted felons, of the Governor, Secretary of State, Controller, Attorney General and Wardens of the State Prisons. They are clothed with full power to hear and determine all applications for pardon, except for treason, which character of exceptional crime is to be referred to and acted on by the next Legislature after conviction. When a prisoner is serving a sentence for a second offense a written recommendation of a majority of the Supreme Judges is required before a pardon can be granted. Now, in our judgment, this suggested amendment is totally wrong from its incipency. It contemplates a radical revolution in the prerogatives of the three departments of the government. The Governor of a State is essentially and exclusively the pardoning power, and when it is attempted by legislation to take it out of his hands then the Executive is made subservient to a co-ordinate and equal branch of our system of government. The Governor should be the last and highest power to which an appeal should be made in cases of pardon. Associate him with three of his Cabinet, so to call them, and the Wardens, as contemplated by constitutional amendment No. 8, and he is brought to a level with officers whose superior and executive he is, and to whom in time they may be called on to appeal for some cause. Again, the Attorney General should not be made one of the Board of Pardons, simply because he is the law interpreter of the State, and his duties demand that he should not be clothed with executive duties belonging exclusively to the Governor. He may be called on to explain the law governing cases coming before the board, and in such cases would be found occupying the triple position of lawyer, judge and juror. It is true he is, probably, placed on the board to interpret the law for the other members, but then he is also made a judge of the merits of the case, and has a vote on the pardon. He should be left off the commission, free and untrammelled to give an unbiased opinion as to the legality of any point arising during the progress of proceedings before a body endowed with such extraordinary powers. Nor should the Wardens of the two prisons of the State be taken from their duties as principal guards over the criminals to act as friends or enemies, as their interests would incline them, on a pardon commission. They should be kept at their duty and only be called on as witnesses if wanted.

Yet we believe a Board of Pardons would be one of the very best creations the State could at once bring into being. And let us briefly outline the manner in which it could be organized without cost to the State, without amendment to the Constitution and without interference with any branch of the government in their respective and separate obligations. And we respectfully ask the careful attention of the members of the Legislature to this suggestion, as we believe it to be a good proposition. Let a bill be introduced creating a Board of Pardon Commissioners, to be composed of the Lieutenant Governor, Secretary of State, State Controller, State Treasurer and Surveyor General. Here we have all the administrative officers of the State, or the Cabinet, as it were, excluding the Governor and Attorney General, but including the Lieutenant Governor, for whom alone anything would have to be paid, and that might be made a per diem while sitting, together with the mileage of a legislator. Let the board enact its own rules of procedure; meet every two or three months to hear cases, the Governor and Attorney General to be present, the latter to represent the State's prosecution and hear the evidence and the arguments. After the list of cases would have been heard, the sessions being held daily till the completion of the work, the board would hold their executive sessions and consider the cases, after which they could form their conclusions and make to the Governor such recommendations for pardon or commutation or other action as their judgment prompted. The Governor, having heard the merits of the cases when presented to the board, would not be long in determining his final action. Then the Attorney General stands ready to advise the Governor on the law of any question submitted. The Wardens would, as already suggested, occupy the position of witnesses when called on by either side, those applying for pardon and those opposing. This is but a crude and hastily outlined idea of a plan for the creation of what would be in the nature of a court of petition without the power to issue the pardon, which still remains in the hands of the Governor, but with the full power to hear all the evidence in meritorious cases. And a great virtue of the method is its economy. The sessions could all be held in the Capitol, for we can anticipate no case that would require sessions to be held at either of the prisons. Again, by the methods of such a board the filthy stench that has so long surrounded the reputation of the pardon system of California would be forever avoided. Will our present Legislature take some action of the kind, or of any other kind looking toward a remedy for an evil that has disgraced the State for the last ten years?

We believe it was in the legislative session of 1883 that the term "cinch bill" was coined, and that it was made applicable to proposed measures to hamper corporations and industries to the extent that they would yield up money for their defeat. The term is applicable. It would seem that persons elected to pass upon the laws for the people should be in better business than to devote their time to the introduction of absurd measures, particularly when it is apparent to any intelligent on-looker that the motive, either on the part of the member or the lobby, is to extort money. Happily the era of anti-railroad legislation has passed. True it has been that the carrying corporations have been compelled to pay heavy sums to be permitted to exist and do business. Insurance companies have always been a favorite prey, and particularly have those incorporated elsewhere but doing business in this State—foreign corporations. The argument is made that the premiums they receive are taken hence, and that they contribute little to local governmental support. Therefore it is argued restrictions should be placed upon them. This scheme of "cinching," while by no means new in California, is of ancient history in the older States, and to counteract it several of the States, to protect their companies, have passed retaliatory laws, prohibiting companies doing business within their borders, whose places of business are in States wherein laws exist restrictive of foreign companies. It would seem that a mushroom statesman from a cow county should realize that the companies of this State cannot carry our insurance with safety; that in the event of an extensive fire in a city, the local companies, had they the risks alone, would be swamped. Then there is the familiar "valued policy bill," the corpse of which is galvanized every two years. The object of the introduction of these measures is simply to attempt to compel the companies to put up, but we understand they have very wisely determined to let the Legislature severely alone. They are certainly correct, for should it happen the Legislature should pass an unreasonable measure, there is no doubt it would lack the Executive sanction to become a law.

As a rule there are but few members who indulge in the introduction of "cinch" bills—some of them are duped by interested lobbyists, and others are corrupt. We had occasion in the session of 1885 to observe with curiosity the acts of men in this regard; to see the transparent effrontery of the mercenary legislator, and the delusion of the honest but unsophisticated statesman. One enterprising member then introduced a bill to stamp into the tin the date upon which canned goods were packed. A gentleman interested came into the Assembly chamber excitedly and calling the attention of the Sacramento delegation to it, asked if they would introduce him to the author of the bill. His request was declined; he was instructed to write to all canners in the State to pay no attention to the bill; it was never reported. Another member, as conscientious as men are created, introduced an anti-slogging bill, and to the surprise of all it met with the hearty support of the element esteemed to be in for boodle, and passed first and second readings. It failed on third reading. Afterward it developed that the lobby had compelled the proprietor of a sporting place in San Francisco to give up some $700 in order to kill the bill. We speak of these as but two instances of the many that happened that session. It is apparent from the character of some of the bills that have been introduced in this Legislature the same tactics are being pursued. It has happened in the past and perhaps has happened this time, that copies have been made of "cinch" bills that had been introduced in former Legislatures. That very fact is suspicious, and a person introducing one of them should be called to account by the House. While these bills never pass, they subject citizens and interests to annoyance and embarrassment, and the cost of their printing and the time they consume in their consideration in committees and the Houses is no small item; time could better be consumed in legitimate legislation. A few stinging rebukes in the shape of committee reports would have a very salutary effect, for the members who are in this business for money are soon recognized by the more intelligent in a public body.

It seems that one C. S. Capp of San Francisco has conceived the brilliant idea that the delays of the law will be remedied if official shorthand reporters of the courts will be abolished. Concerning Capp's suggestion the San Francisco Star says:

Jack Cade's universal remedy—to usher in the millenium—was: "Kill all the lawyers." Now comes C. S. Capp with a remedy for all the evils of the "law's delays," whereof much has been written of late in our daily papers; and his short and simple method of satisfactory delivery is: "Abolish all the shorthand reporters." No doubt there has been a great deal of imposition upon the public treasury through some of the Police Court official reporters' manipulations, or manipulations in their name. But when Mr. Capp says that the shorthand reporters lengthen the trial of causes he makes himself ridiculous. For the uniform testimony of judges and lawyers and others most competent to speak about the matter, having had experience before as well as since the introduction of shorthand reporters into our courts, is that the shorthand man has saved the court and jury two-thirds in time, and proportionately in toil. Mr. Capp is the same gentleman who recently sought to distinguish himself by voluntarily espousing, in a long letter, the "cause" of printing offices that were boycotted by the Typographical Union.

It is quite evident the writer in the Star knows what he is talking about. That there have been barefaced extortions practiced by some of the reporters in San Francisco is true, and with the men guilty of such extortions we have no sympathy, nor are they indorsed by the better class of shorthand reporters. The abolition of court reporters would tend to delay in the determination of cases, and in case an arbitrary judge was on the bench the settlement of statements in cases he had tried would vest in him absolutely. In the shorthand notes of the reporter there is a safeguard to the bar and to clients. Instead of abolishing court reporters we believe the office should be made more important, and that in addition to the test of speed now prescribed—150 words a minute—no person should be appointed unless he passes such legal and general examination that will demonstrate that, aside from the mere writing down of shorthand, and writing out everything that was said, be it grain or chaff, he possesses the knowledge and discretion to intelligently discriminate. In this county there were but two transcripts in civil cases written out in full in the last year. The custom here is for attorneys to indicate to the reporters the portions of the testimony to be written out in full, or condensed; and as a rule the work of the reporters is incorporated in the statement. In this way attorneys are saved labor and clients money. We understand that some reporters, particularly some in San Francisco, regard only the number of "folios" that can be strung out. A little amendment to the law would not be agreeable to them, and the opposition would come only from that quarter.

One of the problems of good governments, is the proper distribution of taxes. We observe that the French Chambers have under consideration a bill for the imposition of a heavy tax on bachelors, for the purpose of discouraging celibacy, and compelling men to bear their share of the commonwealth, which they try to shirk by refusing to marry and assume the responsibility of a family. In Germany, the Prussian Landtag is engaged in the discussion of Emperor William's plan, which provides for the assessment of the income tax proportionately to the size of the family. He recommends a deduction for each child of persons whose income amounts to less than three thousand marks. By this, a half dozen children would exempt the parents from the income tax. The great object of these enactments is to increase the population. In the United States there is a growing necessity for a tax on bachelors, in order to relieve the burden on the parents of large families. Cannot some of our law-givers and political economists devise some similar schemes to those of France and Germany?

Another of the pioneers has passed away. Doctor H. W. Nelson, widely known and respected, died on Wednesday, February 4th, after a lingering illness. There was no more companionable man in the State, jovial, entertaining, and always ready with a fund of anecdotes and reminiscences of early days in the land of gold. We have known Doctor Nelson from our earliest childhood. As a surgeon he had few equals, and his reputation for wonderful and successful operations in his profession is as broad as the State. He was fond of field sports, and rarely a season passed that he did not go on a hunting tour in the large game districts. The camp fire was his special delight. Doctor Nelson was a native of Canada and wrote and spoke the French language fluently. At the time of his death he was 65 years of age, lacking a few months. He leaves a widow, but no children.

The bill for the furnishing of a mansion for the Governor should be passed. Mr. Bruner's bill proposes the purchase of the Steffens property, at Sixteenth and H streets, and the sum proposed is $70,000. The property is well worth that amount. The grounds front 225 feet on H street and 160 on Sixteenth. The buildings are the handsomest on any residence property in the city. The Federal Government has maintained an executive residence for almost a century. The President's house is constructed of free stone and is painted white, from which circumstance it is known as the "White House." The corner stone was laid in 1792, and President Adams occupied it in 1800. It was burned by the British in 1814, but was rebuilt and reoccupied in 1818. Many of the States have executive mansions, and California should have one. She can well afford to be as dignified as her sisters in this regard.

Minister Lincoln is spoken of as Secretary of the Treasury to succeed the late Mr. Windom. Let no false notion of devotion to the memory of the patriot President of the war era prompt Mr. Harrison to make the mistake of selecting an inexperienced young man to the most important position in the Cabinet. Mr. Lincoln is a worthy and exceptionally good man—for the sons of great men seldom result in any good—but to be the financial secretary of a vast and growing nation, now in the upheaval of devising an acceptable monetary system, requires a genius of financeering who is not to be selected by a beck of the presidential finger. Mr. Lincoln makes an acceptable Minister at St. James', but he has not had training in the money schools of the country.

Wind Spirits.

Grimm quaintly remarks in his book on "Teutonic Mythology" that it was quite natural in the olden times to look upon "some female personages as prime movers of the whirlwind." Prof. Fiske, however, tells us that in Norse mythology "it is the devil who is proverbially active in a gale of wind."

The first statement appears to be universally believed in Germany; at least it would seem so from the numerous legends and nursery tales in which "female personages" play an important part. In Vogtland, Northern Franconia, Thuringia, and across Lower Saxony, Frau Holda, or Hulda, who may be regarded as a wind goddess, holds supreme sway. She drives about in a wagon, and flies through the air at will. She haunts lakes and fountains, and sometimes appears as a fair white lady, bathing in the sparkling waters and disappearing under the waves, like the nymphs. Holda likewise belongs to Wuotan's "furious host," and like him can ride on the winds, clothed in terror and accompanied by witches. Thus in Upper Hesse, and the Westerwald, Holle-riding—to ride with Holle—is the same as riding with a witch.

At other times Holda is represented as an ugly old hag with pointed chin, big teeth, a long nose and bristling, thick-matted hair. When she visits the pasture ground of the herdsman she is seen dressed in a blue garment and white veil. She loves music and song under this appearance, and her lay has a doleful melody called "Huldreslad." In the forests you see Holden as an old woman clothed in gray, marching at the head of her flock milk-pail in hand.

It is supposed that she carries off unbaptized children, and according to a widespread belief these little heathens, falling victims to Wuotan, or Holda, have thenceforth joined the "Wutende Herr," or "furious host." It was also believed that Holda led an army of mice, for these were regarded as sacred animals, and were supposed to represent the souls of little children.

Then again Holda appears as the queen of the mountain sprites, who are known as Huldrefolk; and of the elves and the water naiads. She flies through the air at will in a wagon drawn by two cats, animals which are sacred to her, and which are supposed to be the favorites of old hags and witches. In some parts of Germany they say, if a bride goes to her wedding on a bright, sunshiny day, "she has fed the cat well"—meaning that she had propitiated the goddess of love.

She Knew Their Record.

"Now, madam," said the attorney for the defendant to a little, wiry, black-eyed, fidgety woman who had been summoned as a witness in a breach of the peace case, "You will please give your testimony in as few words as possible. You know the defendant?"

"Know who?"

"The defendant—Mr. Joshua Bagg."

"Josh Bagg! I guess I do know him, and I don't know nothing to the credit of either of 'em, and I don't think——"

"We don't want to know what you think, madam. Please say 'yes' or 'no' to my question."

"What question?"

"Do you know Mr. Joshua Bagg?"

"Don't I know 'im, though? Well, I should smile! You ask Josh Bagg if he knows me. Ask him if he knows anything 'bout tryin' to cheat a pore widder like me out of a two-year-old steer? Ask him if——"

"Madam, I——"

"Ask him whose land he got his cordwood off of last spring, and why he hauled it in the night. Ask his wife, Betsy Bagg, if she knows anything about slippin' in a neighbor's paster lot and milkin' three cows on the sly. Ask——"

"Look here, madam——"

"Ask Josh Bagg about that uncle of his that died in a penitentiary out West. Ask him about lettin' his pore old mother die in the porehouse. Ask Betsy Bagg about puttin' a big brick in a lot of butter she sold last fall——"

"Madam, I tell you——"

"See if Josh Bagg knows anything about feeding ten head of cattle all the salt they would eat, and then lettin' them swill down all the water they could hold just 'fore he driv them into town and sold 'em. See what he's got to say to that."

"That has nothing to do with the case. I want you to——"

"Then there was old Azrael Bagg, own uncle to Josh, got rid of his native town on a rail 'tween two days, and Betsy Bagg's own brother got ketched in a neighbor's henhouse at midnight. Ask Josh——"

"Madam, what do you know about this case?"

"I don't know the first livin' thing 'bout it, but I'll bet Josh Bagg is guilty, whatever it is. The fact is, I've owed them Baggses a grudge for the last fifteen years and I got myself called up as a witness on purpose to get even with them, and I feel that I've done it. The Value of Time.

One morning when Benjamin Franklin was busy in the press room on his newspaper, a lounge stepped into the bookstore and spent an hour or more looking over the books. Finally he seemed to settle upon one, and asked the clerk the price.

"One dollar," the clerk answered.

"One dollar," echoed the lounge, "can't you take less than that?"

"One dollar is the price," the clerk answered.

The would-be purchaser looked over the books awhile longer and then inquired: "Is Mr. Franklin in?"

"Yes, he's busy in the printing office," the clerk replied.

"Well, I want to see him," said the man.

The clerk told Mr. Franklin that a gentleman was in the store, waiting to see him. Franklin soon appeared and the stranger said, "what is the lowest, Mr. Franklin, that you can take for that book?"

"One dollar and a quarter," was the prompt answer.

"One dollar and a quarter! Why, your clerk asked me only a dollar just now."

"True," replied Franklin, "and I could have better afforded to take a dollar than to leave my work."

The man seemed surprised, and, wishing to end a parley of his own seeking, said: "Well, come now, tell me the lowest price for this book?"

"One dollar and a half."

"A dollar and a half! Why, you offered it yourself for a dollar and a quarter."

"Yes," said Franklin, coolly, "and I had better have taken that price then, than a dollar and a half now."

This was a way of trade which took the man quite by surprise. Without a word he laid the money on the counter, took the book and left the store.—Youth's Companion.

It was a minister who told this story. The conversation had drifted around to weddings, and incidentally marriage fees were touched upon. "There is always something amusing," he said, "about this wedding fee. I have seen very few bridegrooms who were calm and self-possessed enough to act as if they seemed to know just what they were doing. But when I had a church in a New England village once I had a little experience which proved to me that one man, at least, knew a good bargain when he saw it, even if he were getting married. An odd-looking couple came to me to be made man and wife. There seemed to be no objection to the marriage and I married them. When the ceremony was over the bridegroom drew me aside and whispered in my ear that he hadn't a cent in the world. I smiled and told him that that was all right. I was very busy and did not go to the door with them. Well, I started to go out to make a call that evening. I found that the bridegroom had taken my hat, leaving his own shabby affair in its place, and also a new pair of overshoes which were in the hall. That thrifty couple may be rich now. I am still a poor preacher."

The elephant has more muscles in its trunk than any other creature possesses in its entire body, their number being, according to Cuvier, no less than 40,000; while the whole of a man's muscles only number 527. The proboscis or trunk of the elephant, which contains this vast quantity of small muscles, variously interlaced, is extremely flexible, endowed with the most exquisite sensibility and the utmost diversity of motion.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

It is only the comedian who is pleased when his friends gave him the laugh.

Theater patrons generally realize that the scene painter is an unseen painter.

James O'Neil's Bonanza Prince should be a great play. It was written by a Dazy.

The American, a dramatization of Henry James' novel, has been put on the English stage.

Managers should never impose upon the public by announcing those who fail to appear, without some explanation.

Dick—Why couldn't Harry go to the theater with us to-night? Tom—He couldn't possibly come; had to write the criticisms of the plays for to-morrow's paper, and have them in by 8 o'clock.

Governor Boyd, the new Executive of Nebraska, has been a successful theater manager, and it is argued from that fact that he will have no difficulty in conducting the affairs of a State House.

Hamfatter (the comedian)—Don't you know, I believe I'm equal to better things than this comedy business. I feel that I could make a good appearance in tragedy. Sheerwell—Considering that you've killed everything you've had anything to do with, I should say that tragedy was just in your line.

It was a performance of Trovatore in Italian, and he couldn't make out much of it. "Do you mean to say that fellow is in jail?" he asked his city cousin as Menrico began singing the "Miserere." "Yes." "Well, if I made a noise like he's been making all night and called it singing, I'd expect to be put in jail, too."

Rose Coghlan has secured a pretty little one-act piece called Nance Oldfield, which she proposes to do as a curtain raiser to precede Lady Barter. It is an adaption of Charles Reade's sketch entitled, Art. a Dramatic Tale. The adaptation was made by Charles Reade himself and was only secured a few days ago by Miss Coghlan.

Lawrence Barrett's new play is called Guido Ferranti. The name of the author is not given. Mr. Barrett declines at present to mention it. The play is based on an Italian love story of the sixteenth century. Guido Ferranti, the hero, has sworn an oath of vengeance against his father's murderer, whom he discovers to be the reigning Duke of Padua, at whose court he has taken service and with whose young wife he has fallen in love. The progress of the love story, the death of the Duke and the subsequent tragic ending of the drama has been woven by the unknown author into a stage tale of intense and cumulative interest, dealing after the manner of all tragedies with the various passions of love, hatred and revenge, but treated in such a novel and original manner that many of the situations will be found to be extremely startling in their unexpected dramatic surprises. The scenes of the play are laid in Padua, Italy, and include the market place in Padua, the palace of the Duke, a corridor in the Duke's palace, a hall of justice and the prison at Padua.

The cynical humor and eccentric sayings of Beau Brummel, whom Richard Mansfield is now impersonating so successfully, were not always received by the auditors in the manner which their originator anticipated or desired. At one time Brummel was a member of Watier's Club, in London, which was then the most noted gambling place in the metropolis. Among his fellow members was a man named Bligh, whose eccentricity amounted at times to mild insanity. One evening the Beau, having lost a considerable stake, affected, in his farcical way, a very tragic and suicidal air, and cried out: "Waiter, bring me a candle-stick and a loaded pistol!" Upon which Bligh, who was sitting opposite to him, calmly produced two pistols from his pocket and, placing them upon the table, said: "Mr. Brummel, if you are really desirous to put a period to your existence I am extremely happy to offer you the means without troubling the waiter." The effect upon those present may be easily imagined, for it was apparent to all that the good-natured offer was sincerely meant. A few judicious words from the Beau, now all seriousness, induced the other to repocket the weapons, but the incident somewhat dampened the spirits of the card party, which quickly broke up and separated.

"I have observed in my experience as a stage director," said Edward Harrigan, "many peculiar mannerisms of actors in receiving and studying their roles. When the parts of a play are given to the company at the first rehearsal the ladies and gentlemen of the cast go here and there about the stage, silently and quickly scanning the lines of their different characters. The comedian who has, in stage parlance, 'plenty of fat' in the role assigned him wears a broad grin, while others, who, after reading their parts, know their lines are only feeders to the comedian, look crestfallen and sadly place the unwelcome role in their pockets. The comedian as a rule laughs and jokes over his lines with the company, and those who feel that they 'stand out' in the cast laugh with him. Others who are discomfited do not see the point of the joke, and 'it's all quite natural.' The director must fully understand these peculiarities and commence his rehearsal totally indifferent to them, bearing in mind that to bring out the 'bits' strongly he must have harmony in the company. In my plays I score many a point that helps success by interpolating lines that 'fatten' the minor roles and encourage the smaller people to better endeavor, thereby creating good feeling in my company. The study of the roles allotted to my people begins when I call the rehearsal without parts. By that time I have cut, altered, interpolated and made general havoc with the manuscript. As a rule I am always shaky on the first night with my lines."—N. Y. World.

The novel, in these days, that goes upon its literary merit is the exception.

The discovery of Aristotle's treatise on the constitution of Athens is pronounced by the London Times as almost unprecedented in the history of classical learning.

The venerable James Parton works six hours a day at his home in Newburyport. His desk is his place of rest and recreation, for that is what literary occupation means to him.

Author—"What do you mean, sir, by continually alluding to me as a flat?" Publisher—"No offense intended, I assure you; to my certain knowledge you are living wholly on your first story."

It is said that Daniel Webster was the first editor of the first college paper published in this country, the initial number appearing at Dartmouth in 1800. These journals now number 190 in the United States, while but one is issued in England.

"Marguerite" is a novel by George de Peyerbrune, translated by some one who does not care to give his name. It belongs to the modern French school, and to get at the moral of it the reader must go through a great many pages of fine social veheerence.

Mrs. Southworth is the author of eighty novels, "Retribution," the first story, being published in 1849. That is big work for a woman's hand and brain, and the world none the worse for it, either. The latter fact is her crowning triumph.

That aspiring young writer, Aristotle, has just committed one of his earlier productions to the British museum. The manuscript was dug out of a Grecian ruin and identified. Here is genuine encouragement for rising genius. Authors and spring poets can rest in the assurance that several centuries hence their productions may perhaps come to light in the same way. What is a lifetime to immortal fame, anyhow?

Would you think that a piece of Jules Verne's fiction, absolutely impossible of reality on the face of it, could be taken seriously? Well, it can be. There was published in the Tribune an extract purporting to come from the Tribune some time in the next century, giving a reporter's account of a trip from New York to San Francisco through a pneumatic tube in a few minutes. A serious Englishman saw this extract republished in an English paper, and wrote to the Tribune to learn if the trip had actually been made as described. The funniest part of the whole thing is that he requested an early answer, as a bet was to be decided by it. Shades of the laughing philosopher!

New York had a curious sensation during the week of the auction sale of the late Allen Thorndyke Rice's effects. Aided by a factious auctioneer and a lot of humorous reporters, the memory of a distinguished and accomplished gentleman was treated with a harshness and flippancy entirely unlooked for. No man would deprecate more earnestly the extraordinary manner in which the sale was conducted than Mr. Rice himself. He was in no sense a poseur, and the talk about the poker chips advertised at the sale would indicate he was accustomed to playing $100,000 poker every night in the week. The talk about Mr. Rice's anti-fat remedies was as pointless as the wild stories of his play at cards. The fact that he left bottles of anti-fat does not prove anything. He was, if anything, a shade too thin. There seemed good reason to believe that many of the things presented at the sale as the effects of the late Allen Thorndyke Rice were introduced by outside dealers who wished to trade on his name. But the painful part of it all was the remarkable overhauling which the Rice effects received. He was a man of quiet and reserved habits, and abhorred publicity of all kinds. His manner was gentle and his life modeled on the rules which govern well-bred men of the world. If his executors had a keener appreciation of the dead diplomat's character, they would have cut short some of the sensationalism of the sale. It does not reflect very much credit upon them.

Professional Chat.

That venerable common law relic, the "Rule in Shelley's Case," has just been reaffirmed by the Supreme Court of Indiana (Taney vs. Fahney, 25 N. E. Rep. 882). Every law student in this State learns this rule before he goes up for examination for the Bar, and, having passed that examination, generally forgets it. Probably no question in the domain of the law has created more intense and protracted litigation, or been the topic of more volumes or more arguments than that which was enunciated by the great Coke in Shelley's case. The rule, as then laid down, was "When the ancestor, by any gift or conveyance, taketh an estate of freehold, and in the same gift or conveyance an estate is limited, either mediately or immediately, to his heirs in fee or tail, the heirs are words of limitation of the estate, and not words of purchase." That is to say, the first taker takes the whole estate in fee simple, irrespective of the limitation in favor of his heirs. The opinion of Lord Coke imbedded this doctrine into the English law as firmly as if it were an enactment of Parliament.

General S. D. Lee, of Mississippi, says that few know how brilliant a man General Braxton Bragg really was. "His unfortunate temper," says the New Orleans Times-Democrat, "made him unavailable as an army commander; but as a strategist, tactician and wit he had few equals in the army. An instance of the latter occurred in 1858, at Fort Sumter. Bragg's staff was depleted to such an extent that he suddenly found himself post and battery commander and quartermaster. There had been several disputes as to supplies, which had not been definitely passed upon. Bragg saw his chance and determined to force a decision. As Captain Bragg of the artillery, he made a requisition upon Acting Quartermaster Bragg. This, as quartermaster, he refused, and sent back an exceedingly sharp note. Captain Bragg retorted in kind, and Acting Quartermaster Bragg then referred the whole matter to Post-Commander Braxton Bragg. In this capacity he severely criticised both officers for the personal nature of their remarks, and referred the whole matter to Washington. Floyd was Secretary of War, and at first was furious, but it was pointed out to him that the correspondence was officially correct, and that Bragg could not be held accountable for any violation of army regulations. He was, therefore, obliged to decide the point, ignoring Bragg's appearance in a triple character. He afterward habitually referred to himself as 'the concentrated inhabitant.'"

It has sometimes happened that a lawyer has, in the language of the street, "given himself away" to a smart adversary. Garrow did this once when examining a witness in the Court of Queen's Bench. "Are you a fortune-teller?" he asked. "I am not," replied the man; "but I can tell yours." The shrewd counsel tripped, and was worsted. "What is that to be?" said he. "Why, sir," was the sly response, "as you made your first speech at the Old Bailey, so you will make your last there." In a like manner, arguing before a jury of judges, an over-smart counsel stopped short in his pleading. He was confident of obtaining a successful result, and Lord Newton vexed him by seeming to be in deep slumber. Addressing the other Lords on the bench, he said: "My Lords, it is unnecessary to go on, as Lord Newton is fast asleep." What was his consternation when an answer came—"Ay, ay," cried the angry Judge, "you will have proof of that by and by." And to the astonishment and chagrin of the young advocate and to the intense interest of the others, Newton luminously reviewed the case and gave a decided judgment against the too sanguine counsel. Even the cleverest lawyers have been "set down" in open Court by equally ready witnesses. "Did you see this tree, that has been mentioned, by the roadside?" an advocate inquired. "Yes, sir; I saw it very plainly." "It was conspicuous, then?" The witnesses seemed puzzled by the new word. He repeated his former assertion. Sneered the lawyer: "What is the difference between plain and conspicuously?" But he was hoist with his own petard. The witness smoothly and innocently answered: "I can see you plainly, sir, amongst the other lawyers, though you are not a bit conspicuous." In another comical instance the attack was directed against the character of the witness. But it recoiled. "You were in the company of these people?" "Of two friends, sir." "Friends! Two thieves, I suppose you mean." "That may be so," was the dry retort, "they are both lawyers." The blow that destroys the effect of an adverse examination is occasionally more accident than conscious effort. In a trial, not long ago, a very simple witness was in the box; and, after going through his ordeal, was ready to retire. One question remained. "Now, Mr. —, has not an attempt been made to induce you to tell the Court a different story?" "A different story to what I have told, sir?" "Yes; is it not so?" "Yes, sir." "Upon your oath, I demand to know who the persons are who have attempted this." "Well, sir, you've tried as hard as any of 'em," was the unexpected answer. It ended the examination.

But if you corner him he still hedges a little. He is like the teetotaler who would touch nothing stronger than sweet cider, but if the cider was hard you might put a little whisky in to soften it.

Great convenience results to lawyers and all other interested parties in New York by the fact that a law has recently gone into effect which provides for short and simple forms for real estate deeds and mortgages. It is still lawful to use the old forms, but the register and county clerk of New York City and Brooklyn are authorized to charge a fee of five dollars additional for recording an old style deed.

Society is burdened and cursed by those who lead aimless lives. Next to the man who does positive injury to society stands the man who does nothing for it at all. He who has no purpose in living deserves to die, for he makes existence a crime. To say that he has nothing for which to live, nothing which renders life worth the living, is but giving a true expression of false ideas, for there is something to be done, both for himself and others, at every man's hand, the performance of which will bring its own reward.

Russians are fond of the pleasures of the table, and during waking hours eat about six times a day—an average of once every two hours. When you go to the house of a Russian, be he a friend or a stranger, you are at once invited to a side table, where salted meats, pickled eel, salted cucumbers, and many other spicy and appetizing viands are urged upon you with an impressiveness that knows no refusal. This repast is washed down with frequent cups of vodka, or Russian whisky. That over, and when the visitor feels as if he had eaten enough for twenty-four hours, the host says: "And now for dinner."

Superstition has not died out in Essex, England. In the village of Sible Hedingham lives an old laborer who is popularly supposed to be a wizard. Recently he told a man in charge of a load of straw that he would not get far with it, and soon the horse, an old one, fell, and was so injured that it had to be killed on the spot. The men called upon to assist were so convinced that the horse had been placed under the influence of the wizard that they refused to move the carcass until a slice of flesh had been cut from the animal and burned in a bush faggot, the idea being that the person who cast the spell would suffer burning in a corresponding part of his body.

Of the thousands of people who know and love that sweet old ballad, "Annie Laurie," doubtless not one in two thousand know its origin. Annie Laurie was born in 1728, and was about seventeen years old when the incident occurred which gave rise to the song bearing her name. James Laurie, Annie's father, was a farmer, who lived in Dunfriesshire, Scotland. He hired a man by the name of Wallace to act as foreman, and while in his employ Mr. Wallace fell in love with Annie Laurie, which fact her father soon learned, and forthwith discharged him. He went home to Maxwellton and was taken sick the very night he reached there, and the next morning when Annie heard of it, she came to his bedside and waited on him till he died. On his death-bed he composed the song entitled "Annie Laurie."

Says the staid Boston Traveller: Indian titles are somewhat different from those in vogue in the days of J. Fenimore Cooper, and hardly in keeping with the dignity of character with which he was invested by this writer. Red Cloud, it is true, is a Cooper name, and Sitting Bull is not altogether objectionable to those who would conceive the Indian as he is written, rather than as he is. But it is hard to associate Spotted Tail, Big Foot, Two Strike, High Pipe and Hole-in-His-Pants, with the haughty, high-minded, proud-spirited aborigine of fiction, whose felicity of speech was rivalled only by his elevation of soul. Such names destroy all the glamour with which the red man has been invested by literature. Who can weave any romance around a savage who draws government rations as Hole-in-His-Pants? We very much doubt if the names bestowed upon these Indians are in any sense a translation of their cognomens in their native tongue. It looks as if they were the victims of frontier wit and have been christened by cowboys.

The New York Star's "Man About Town" writes the following about California products. It is possible that some foundation lies for the statement, but the great bulk of our products are not included in these strictures: "California brands of all kinds of things in the edible line have in the past few years taken the place of foreign products of the same nature. This is particularly the case with fancy and staple groceries, such as raisins, olives, dried fruits and so on. At the same time, some of my business friends tell me that the California articles are not in as great favor with the public as they were at first. This is due to the carelessness with which they are packed and prepared. Some of these industries are indeed overcrowded, and the producers try to compensate by cheapness for what their output lacks in quality. In the article of raisins, for instance, the California fruit seemed likely to drive Spanish and other competitors out of the market. Unfortunately, so many people on the Pacific coast went into the business without adequate knowledge of the care that has to be exercised in packing the fruit and making it attractive in appearance that they have seriously affected the whole market. Indeed, a California article, I am told, is no longer accepted on its name, but purchasers have learned to look into the quality even more closely than in the case of foreign goods of the same kind."

Forty-niners' Feast.

The Chicago Inter-Ocean of recent date contains a lengthy account of a re-union and banquet given at the Grand Pacific, on January 19th, by the California Pioneers of that city, some sixty being present. Following the menu card of the Chicago banquet was printed a copy of a souvenir of a pioneer banquet given at Placerville, this State, showing what was then eaten here on "state occasions," and what had to be paid. The olden time card read as follows:

GOLD SCALES ON THE END OF THE BAR.

How formidable was that dinner eaten in London by eight persons of fashion—or, at any rate, served to them—in the time of Swift and Addison and Steele! It began with a sirloin of beef, fish, a shoulder of veal, and a tongue. They drank claret with the fish. This was the first course; then came almond pudding, fritters, chickens, black puddings, and soup. Wine and small beer were drunk during the second course. A hot venison patty was the chief ingredient of the third, but with it were a hare, a rabbit, pigeons, partridges, and goose—with more beer and wine to add to the tumult of sensation. Some took down a dram of brandy—as it were to watch the goose. A tankard of October followed, and it was passed from hand to hand and from mouth to mouth. The Burgundy came on with the cheese. When the ladies had tasted that generous liquor their probation was at an end, and they were suffered to depart to their tea. As they went out of the room they met fresh bottles coming in. Of course there could be but one result of the exuberance of spirits provoked by a dietary of this kind. Our fathers had to conquer the world or die. Our dinners made our Colonial Empire—in the long run, though it was some time before the remedy was found. All the civil tumult of the eighteenth century was in this diabolical menu.

FLASHES.

Ignorance of sin is bliss.

Marzen-Taylor Wedding.

At the residence of the bride, 614 Thirteenth street, Wednesday evening at 8 o'clock, Joseph Marzen, Jr., of Truckee, was united in marriage with Mrs. Helen R. Taylor, Rev. Silcox officiating. The groom is one of the wealthiest and most popular young men in Nevada county. The bride has for years held a high position in the public schools of this city, and has ever been looked upon as one of the best educators on the coast. George W. Waldron, a brother of the bride, and Miss Laura Kirn stood up with the couple while Hymen's knot was being tied. After the ceremony, the guests, to the number of forty or more, were invited to the banquet room where a fine collation was served. The happy couple were toasted in many a bumper of wine. May their shadows never grow less, and may their only cares be little ones.

Amount of Sleep Required.

The Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage is credited with the following: "There is not one man or woman in ten thousand who can afford to do without seven or eight hours' sleep. All those stories written about great men and women who slept only three or four hours a night make interesting reading; but I tell you, my readers, no man or woman yet ever kept healthy in body or mind for a number of years with less than seven hours sleep.

Americans need more sleep than they are getting. This lack makes them so nervous and the insane asylum so populous. If you can get to bed early, then rise early. If you cannot get to bed until late, then rise late. It may be as Christian for one man to rise at 8 as it is for another to rise at 5.

I counsel my readers to get up when they are rested, but let the rousing bell be rung at least thirty minutes before your public appearance. Physicians say that a sudden jump out of bed gives irregular motion to the pulse. It takes hours to get over a too sudden rising. Give us time after you call us to roll over, gaze at the world full in the face, and look before we leap.

How to See the Wind.

Take a polished metallic surface of two feet or more with a straight edge—a large handsaw will answer the purpose. Select a windy day, whether hot or cold, clear or cloudy, only let it not rain or the air be murky; in other words, let the air be dry. Hold the metallic surface at right angles to the wind; that is, if the wind be north, hold your surface east and west, and incline it at an angle of about 45 degrees to the horizon, so that the wind striking, glances and flows over the edge. Now, sight carefully over the edge at some minute and sharply defined object, and you will see the air flow over as water flows over a dam.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

Donnelly and Girard did a good business with Natural Gas in a New Meter on Thursday and Friday nights.

Sarah Bernhardt, the Great, has got back to this country. She denies having snakes; she uses lizards in her "Cleopatra."

Great preparations are being made by the McNeill Club for the presentation of Pinafore. The young ladies and gentlemen in the cast are becoming proficient in their respective roles.

Patti Rosa will hold the boards of the Metropolitan Tuesday and Wednesday next with her new play, Imp. She has a good company in support. The personation was a great success at the Bush-street Theater, San Francisco, last week.

It has been determined that the resistance of the air to a bullet three-quarters of an inch in diameter, weighing one twelfth of a pound, is about ten pounds, or 120 times the weight of a bullet at a velocity of about 1,600 feet per second. On the principle of mechanical similitude it has been shown that a 24-pound cannon ball fired with a charge of sixteen pounds of powder should acquire a velocity of 1,650 foot seconds, and that the resistance of the air would then amount to 540 pounds, or nearly twenty-three times the weight of the shot.

It is estimated that there are about 350,000 persons in this country with only one or no legs. Many lost their limbs in the war, but since that time the great amputator is the railroad. Ninety per cent. of amputations are chargeable to the railroad, according to a writer in the Times, who also states that among 4,056 cases of loss of limbs reported in the daily papers in six months, 3,500 were railroad cases.

Self-Control the Secret.

Much sensation and discussion has been aroused among the Russian residents of Nice by the decision of the Czar forbidding any of his subjects to enter the principality of Monaco. This interdiction has been caused by the large number of wealthy Russians who have been ruined at Monte Carlo during the past few months.

The following anecdote goes far to show how slight are the chances which even the richest among the habitués of the roulette tables have of winning persistently:

M. Blanc, the ex-proprietor of the Salles-de-jeu of Monte Carlo, was asked one day by an acquaintance why no one had ever invented a "system" by which it would become possible to win with absolute certainty.

"My dear friend," exclaimed M. Blanc, "I will answer your question when you have answered one which I am about to put to you. How much capital do you put aside to play with?"

"Very little," replied M. X.

"Oh, 300 to 400 francs."

"And you win?"

"Yes, but—"

"You need say no more. I know how you do it."

"Nevertheless, if everybody were to win as regularly as I do, even small sums, it would end by telling on the profits of the Salles-de-jeu."

"To speak plainly," continued M. Blanc with a smile, "all is in my favor here. Man-kind is naturally given to gambling. Gamblers are at once conceited, rash and headstrong; the odds are in my favor, and I have a limit. I told you that I know how you win. It is simply this: You, too, have a limit—very far below mine, of course, but you keep to it—there lies the secret of your luck."

A Woman Who Fascinates.

Man is by nature a discoverer. He likes suggestions, glimpses, possibilities better than sudden and complete revelations. A flash of an eye under a veil or the gleam of a milk neck under soft, filmy stuff are more effective with him than the steady look of an unveiled face or the most décolleté gown ever worn. So, too, a fleeting glimpse of individuality, a suggestion of the real woman, stirs him, sets him thinking, wondering, longing to explore the hidden treasures of a personality.

A prince of cynics recently said to the writer, "a good woman is never fascinating; she is insipid." Upon dissecting this monstrous statement I discovered that he meant a "goody" woman instead of good. The woman who poses on a pedestal, who makes a parade of amiability, whose virtue constitutes a sort of star attraction, is unquestionably very tiresome. One quickly wearies of the woman who in carefully prepared speech sets forth her admirable attributes, or who declares the manner of her repulsing audacious admiration. And while all the world knows that very bad women are often very fascinating, at the same time a man of clear brain and manly instincts avoids such women as he would a pestilence. The woman that is not too good for human nature's daily food, who understands life and its responsibilities, who possessing a strong vein of sentiment can yet conceal it under a mask of graceful cynicism, who holding lofty ideals has yet a spice of Mother Eve in her composition, might not prove unattractive to the prince of cynics who finds a "goody" woman insipid.

The woman who would fascinate must be interested as well as interesting. She must study the man she wishes should study her. She must listen to him a part of the time—not pre-empt the conversation. Man does not like a chatterbox. She must adapt herself to his moods and respond to his conditions. She must become not an echo, but rather a corresponding chord of music. If a deep diapason of gloom be rolled out let not a wanton jig answer it, but rather a touching plaint that shall yet have a hint of hope in its soft strains.—Edith Tupper.

Doctors' Names.

Something might be said in favor of the primitive practice of naming men after they were grown up instead of while they were babies. Under the present system it often happens that a man's name is curiously out of keeping with his character or pursuits. The literary editor of The Doctor has lately been examining a new directory of physicians, and seems to have been greatly impressed by the singularity and inappropriateness of some of the names contained in it.

He thinks, for example, that Dr. Coffin might sound unpleasantly suggestive to a nervous patient, though less so, perhaps, than another name which follows it—Dr. Death. A timid person might object to Dr. Sexton, also, and if one were very sick indeed it would certainly seem ominous if Dr. Death, Dr. Coffin and Dr. Sexton were to hold a consultation at his bedside.

Other names almost as bad as the foregoing are Dr. Butcher and Dr. Slaughter, though they occur several times each in the directory. There are two Dr. Cranks—fewer than might have been expected—and one Dr. Craze, who is, perhaps, in charge of an insane asylum.

Some of the names may be called inappropriately appropriate, such as Aiken, Carver, Cutter, Hash, Diet, Hurt, Mangle, Pellet, Pillmore, Tomb and Toothaker. Dr. Ague and Dr. Shivers might very well be partners, and if a third man were wanted they could hardly do better than to call in Dr. Sweat.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California.—In the matter of the estates and guardianship of Mary F. and Walter J. Hennessy, minors, having filed her petition herein, duly verified, praying for an order of sale of the real estate of said decedent, for the purposes therein set forth, it is therefore ordered by the said Court that all persons interested in the estate of said deceased appear before the said Superior Court on the 6th day of March, 1891, at 10 o'clock A. M. of said day, at the Courtroom of said Superior Court, at County of Sacramento, State of California, to show cause why an order should not be granted to the said guardian to sell so much of the real estate of said minors as shall be necessary. And that a copy of this order be published at least once a week for three successive weeks in THEMIS, a newspaper printed and published in said county.

W. C. VAN FLEET, Judge of the Superior Court.
Dated February 4th, 1891.
C. T. JONES & MATT. F. JOHNSON, [fe7-4] Attorneys for Petitioner.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California.—In the matter of Warren Starr, an insolvent debtor.—Warren Starr, having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, from which it appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said Warren Starr is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said Warren Starr, insolvent debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to such insolvent to him, or to any person, firm, corporation or association for his use; and the said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered, that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Hon. A. P. Catlin, Judge of the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the Courtroom of said Court, in the County of Sacramento, on the 13th day of March 1891, at 10 o'clock, A. M. of that day, to prove their debts and choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered, that the order be published in the THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation, published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published, before the day set for the meeting of creditors. And it is further ordered, that, in the meantime, all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.

Dated February 4th, 1891.
W. C. VAN FLEET, Judge of the Superior Court.
W. A. ANDERSON, Attorney for insolvent.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California.—In the matter of Harry Dewey, an insolvent debtor.—Harry Dewey, having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which it appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said Harry Dewey is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said insolvent debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the Courtroom of said Court, on the 13th day of March, 1891 at 10 o'clock A. M. of that day, to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.

Dated February 6th, 1891.

Harmless Ways of Bringing Art to Improve Nature.

Perfumes should be indulged in by every one, for their stimulating and refreshing properties cannot be overestimated. They are health and beauty giving, especially lavender, lemon, roses, violets, sage and benzoin. Those with pale complexions can in time bring color to their cheeks by bathing with benzoin water or lait virginal.

Thick lips can be reduced by rubbing with tannin.

Pale lips can be induced to show color by friction with black grapes.

Lemon, orange and cucumber peels are excellent for the complexion. Let them soak in your water jug, for they not only soften, but tonify and freshen the complexion, keeping the flesh healthy and firm.

When wiping the face always wipe upward, for this saves many a wrinkle and fullness under the chin. The eyes should always be wiped toward the nose, as it presses out the fine lines from the corners.

A good plan to preserve the skin from becoming set and old is to give the face perfect rest four or five times a day. No matter how busy one's life is, if possible to lie down even five minutes at a time, close the eyes and keep the face in repose. If this is done daily it will prevent the haggard look noticeable with too many women.

Food powder will not harm the skin; on the contrary, it gives a soft, cool look and comfortable feeling. Rice powder is the best to use. It is a good plan to cleanse the face prior to retiring to rest with a little cream or milk of cucumber. Apply with a soft piece of linen, dabbing it well over the face, then wipe off the superfluous moisture. This cleanses the skin better than water, and encourages a delicate and white complexion. Rain water should be used whenever possible, otherwise distilled or rose water is good.—Home Magazine.

Of Humble Origin.

Christopher Columbus was the son of a weaver, and also a weaver himself. Claude Lorraine was bred a pastry cook. Cervantes was a common soldier. Homer was the son of a farmer. Demosthenes was the son of a cutler. Oliver Cromwell was the son of a brewer. Howard was an apprentice to a grocer. Franklin was a journeyman printer and son of a tallow chandler and soap boiler. Daniel Defoe was a hosier and son of a butcher. Cardinal Wolsey was the son of a butcher. Lucien was the son of a maker of statuary. Virgil was the son of a porter. Horace was the son of a shopkeeper. Shakespeare was the son of a wool stapler. Milton was the son of a money scrivener. Pope was the son of a merchant. "LITTLE BO PEEP" had lost her sheep and couldn't tell where to find them." So the old nursery rhyme says, and it goes on to bid her "Leave them alone and they'll come home and bring their tails behind them." All this may be true of lost sheep, but if you have lost your health you cannot afford to leave that alone. It will not come back of its own accord. Some people brag that they never bother about colds. They "let them go the way they came." Alas! too often the victim goes to a consumptive's grave. Until very recently a cure for Consumption, which is universally acknowledged to be a scourge affecting the lungs, would have been looked upon as miraculous, but now people are beginning to realize that the disease is not incurable. Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery will cure it if taken in time and given a fair trial. This world-renowned remedy will not make new lungs, but it will restore diseased ones to a healthy state when other means have failed. Thousands gratefully testify to this. It is the most potent tonic, or strength restorer, alterative, or blood-cleanser, and nutritive, or flesh builder known to medical science. For Lunging Coughs, Weak Lungs, Spitting of Blood, "Liver Complaint" and Dyspepsia or Indigestion, it is an unequalled remedy.

DR. SAGE'S CATARRH REMEDY cures the worst cases, no matter of how long standing. 50 cents, by druggists.

Neatness in Dress at Home.

The importance of neat and tasteful house dressing cannot be overestimated. The matron who appears before the members of the family in a shabby, soiled wrapper and makes the excuse, if, indeed, she takes the trouble to make one at all, that "it is so much more comfortable," has little idea of the possible consequence of such a course. Could she but realize that her dress is an evil example to her daughters, and is productive of consequences that will reach far beyond her own span of life; that the husbands and sons cannot fail to draw comparisons between her dress and that of the ladies they meet in other homes, and that these comparisons cannot fail to decrease their respect for her, she might be induced to give more attention to her personal appearance.

Not even the burden of care and constant employment can furnish a sufficient excuse for careless personal habits, for few things are more important to the well being of a family. There is an old saying to the effect that an untidy mother has disobedient children, and while neither parents nor children may realize the why or wherefore of it, yet there is always a lack of respect and an indifference to the authority of a mother who takes no pride in her personal appearance.

And it is not the mother alone upon whose shoulders rests the burden of responsibility for home neatness and order in dress; the father has his duties to look after as well, and should never fail to insist upon the younger members of the family presenting themselves with well kept hands, clean faces, neatly brushed hair and orderly dress, at least at every meal where the family assembles.—Christian Leader.

One Useful Cigar.

It is told of a sea captain who died not long ago that he was formerly in command of a ship in which passengers were carried from New York to some of the islands. On one occasion the ship caught fire, and the passengers and crew were compelled to take hurriedly to the boats.

The captain remained perfectly cool throughout all the confusion and fright of the embarkation, and at last every one except himself was got safely into the boats.

By the time he was ready to follow the passengers were almost wild with fear and excitement. Instead of hurrying down the ladder the captain called out to the sailors to hold on a minute, and taking a cigar from his pocket coolly lighted it with a bit of burning shroud which had fallen from the rigging at his feet. Then he descended with deliberation and gave the order to push off. "How could you stop to light a cigar at such a moment?" he was asked afterward, when some of the passengers were talking over their escape.

"Because," he answered, "I saw that if I did not do something to divert the minds of those in the boat there was likely to be a panic, and, overcrowded as it was, there was danger of its being upset. The act took but a moment, but it attracted the attention of everybody. You all forget yourselves because you were thinking about my curious behavior, and we got off safely."

Buccaneer and Filibuster.

These terms are deemed by some to be synonymous. They are not. A buccaneer (from boucaner, to smoke or broil meat and fish, to hunt wild beasts for their skins; boucan, a smoking place for meat or fish) was originally one who dries or smokes flesh or fish after the manner of the Indians. The name was first given to the French settlers in Hayti or Hispaniola, whose business it was to hunt wild cattle and swine. An abridgement of Morery, 1694, says of Judge Cavellero, in Hispaniola: "The inhabitants are all buccaneers; that is, they sell at San Domingo ox hides and tallow." Somerville, 1692-1702, says:

No sturdy, desperate buccaneer
Ever suffered hardships more severe.

The pirates, establishing themselves in the West Indies, came to be called buccaneers as we begin to say cowboys for any kind of wild Westerners now-a-days. Filibusters were originally simply fast sailing Dutch sail boats, sliblote, said to have been so named from the river Vli, in Holland. The Dutch traders in the West Indies called the fast sailing boats of the pirates sliblotes (in three syllables), which the Spanish corrupted to filibuster.

During the Hungarian revolution, in 1849, forty prisoners of war were thrown into a deep pool near Hermanstadt. A few weeks ago the bodies were recovered, after an immersion of forty-one years, and they were in a perfect state of preservation, their organs unchanged in form, color or consistence. It is supposed the minerals in the water passed through the pores and had a preservative effect upon the internal organs, as well as upon the entire body.

None are so difficult to please as those who do not wish satisfaction. There seems to be a disposition of certain elements of the Republican party to find fault with the call of the City Central Committee for a primary and convention to nominate candidates for city officers. There is as a matter of fact no reason for any dissatisfaction. The convention is an unusually large one, and the city is divided into ten precincts, giving a very large representation to each. With a large convention there is little probability that any faction or clique can control it. Indeed, there is at this time no motive to further the interests or ambitions of any man or set of men. With a convention of 160 Republicans it is safe to assume that only the best men can secure their favor. From the very nature of the call and the apportionment of delegates it is an impossibility to foretell what the action of the convention may be. No indication appears of covert action by any person. As we stated before, there is nothing at stake to warrant such an assumption. Many of the fault-finders and malcontents have no desire for harmony in the party councils, and these men if given the absolute power to name all the delegates to the convention and the candidates for all the city offices would find fault with their own action. In these times, when Alliances and Independents are the order, our "Citizens' Committee" would not, according to its own statement, accept any olive branch that might be extended by the City Committee. This being the situation, it is only necessary for the good substantial Republicans to proceed to the nomination of worthy and competent men for the several positions, after which the sound judgment of the masses will assert itself and elect them. It must be understood that nothing in the nature of programme should exist or be exercised in this matter. The way to harmonize the party, as a party, is by using good judgment in the nomination of candidates. We cannot expect to harmonize the Democracy with us, or to enlist deserters from the party ranks. In municipal officers care only should be exercised in securing competent men. We have tried the independent process, and our woful situation in matters of local self government is due to this cause. We look forward with great expectations to the next city convention of Republicans, and shall be grievously disappointed if good men are not selected. There is plenty of material, and no possible excuse can be offered for a failure to elect the same. We believe the City Committee has acted in entire good faith and without any ulterior motive in the call for the convention and the apportionment of delegates. If any jobbery appears we will be the first to denounce it. For years it has been part of the tactics of the Democracy to create outside parties under such names as might be convenient, with the ultimate object of foisting Democrats into office. How successful this line of action has been can be determined by taking an observation of our present city government, and the personnel of our city government for twelve years last past. The monstrous city debt can, in a measure, be attributed to this narrow and fatal policy.

The Farmers' Alliance has determined on holding a national convention on February 22, 1892, to fix a date for nominating a candidate for President. There is much danger in this great organization for the Republican party. The States where the Alliance is the strongest are naturally Republican. At the late election the strength of the new factor in politics was shown to be: In Kansas, 106,972; Michigan, 13,198; Minnesota, 58,514; Nebraska, 70,187; North Dakota, 4,821; South Dakota, 24,591. It is true there is a disposition in a number of the Southern States to fall into line with the Alliance, which may offset the effect in the Western States. Still there is danger that the electoral vote will be so divided as to throw the election of President in the House of Representatives, which will give a Democratic President. Republicans cannot afford to ignore this fact, and that they are threatened with defeat through this agency. The Republicans must make a strenuous effort to carry the Eastern States. It is possible that before the Presidential election takes place there may be a change in the situation and the seeds of disorder sown in the Alliance. Indeed, this result is probable in the light of past history. When the Republicans, who form the larger element of this new factor, discover that the result will be a Democratic success they may recant and fall into line for the old party.

Our city has never before felt so heavily the effect of the temporizing treatment of our bonded debt question. For years, through a dangerous policy, we have yielded to the dictates of a system that has brought us to the verge of ruin. In addition to costing this city value of the outstanding debt, the vitality of the government of the municipality has been crippled through over a million of dollars cash, and a great increase in the an erroneous decision of the Supreme Court, by a bare majority, taking 55 per cent. of the gross receipts of the water rents, under an illogical and unjust interpretation of the word "revenue" in the Consolidation Act of 1858. There is nothing sacred in a judicial opinion, when it is clearly wrong or unjust. In our case it is neither stare decisis nor res adjudicata. The sanctity of precedents are not considered as they have been in the dim past. Our progressive jurists do not feel themselves bound to follow precedents when they are wrong. In the decision referred to, the clear and logical conclusion arrived at by Justices Patterson and McFarland, who are still on the bench, while the author of the majority judgment and all but one of the concurring judges will have been relegated to private life, undoubtedly become the law of the case if the question is again submitted to that tribunal. The measures introduced by Senator Sprague, defining the word "revenue," are calculated to enable this question to be re-opened. One of the bills is a general law, while the other two are amendments to the statutes relating to the government of this city. This was a wise precaution, and is intended to fit the recent decision of the Supreme Court, which declared that general laws are paramount to any provisions of municipal charters. It is absurd to conclude that the Legislature ever intended to take 55 per cent. of the gross receipts of the water rents, which would necessitate the levy of additional taxes to meet the running expenses of the water works. But since this has been the ultimatum of the Supreme Court, we must seek some way of having a different interpretation of the word "revenue," and the bills reported favorably by the Senate Judiciary Committee will accomplish this object. As a matter of justice and statutory construction, the water works as constituted under this Act of 1872, creating the new water works system, ought not to be subject to the old Consolidation Act of 1858, nor the receipts from water rents made subject to the demands of the bondholders. All the receipts of the new water works were pledged for the payment of the construction thereof. At the present time new machinery is necessary, and under a fair and just interpretation of the law the receipts should, when constructed, be subject only to demands for the cost of construction. If the people of Sacramento are compelled to submit to the draft of 55 per cent. of the gross receipts from water rents, our present system will have to be abandoned, and we will have to look to some private enterprise for our water supply. Certainly, the bond creditors could not prevent us from abandoning the water works—it would not impair the obligation of any contract. We hope the relief measures named will pass, despite the opposition of those who pose as the friends of the city. We only say, save us from such friends.

There never was a time when the city needed Trustees conversant with these financial questions so much as now. At the coming municipal election some able man should be placed in our local legislature, who would exert himself toward obtaining relief from the incubus that now hangs over us. There are men who understand these matters, if they could be induced to take the management of city affairs in hand.

Some of the great Western papers are advocating the abrogation of the old custom of excluding women from banquets. If there ever was a time when a reason existed for this custom it has passed. The past century has placed woman on a level with man. In many things she has excelled man in the acquirement of knowledge. Women at banquets would serve a good purpose, in addition to their natural rights. Her presence would take all the rough edges off of such occasions. The very reasons often urged why women should not be admitted to banquets—that is to say, when men drink wine women should not be present—is a reason they should be there, and by their presence regulate this indulgence. There are few men who would not govern themselves better in the society of women. The speeches, under the bright inspiration of woman's influence, would be better. Every man wishes to appear at his best when the bright eyes of women are upon him. The vulgar jokes and immodest stories would be banished, and sharp wit and brilliant thoughts take their places if women were admitted to our banquets. Let us always have our wives, sisters and sweethearts at our banquets.

The efforts of some of our State Senators to reduce the pay of the employes of the State printing office recalls to mind an anecdote of the late James W. Coffroth, who was one of the ablest lawyers in the State. In discussing the salary bill, which was pending before the Legislature, he was asked if he did not think the pay of the Senators and Assemblymen was too high. "Not for Senators and Assemblymen," replied the genial Jim, "but the damned fools who poise as such should be enjoined and held for obtaining money under false pretenses." The same trueism will apply to the State printing office employes. The "damned fool Senators and Assemblymen" who are striving to reduce the wages of those printers who are well worth all they receive from the State, are the very same ones who are the most suppliant in beseeching the Superintendent to find places for men in the State printing office, who would be better occupied in shoveling snow, picking fruit, or baling hay, than in endeavoring to struggle with an intricate piece of typographical mechanism. The best and only way to effectually economize would be to cut down the force employed, and increase the standard of workmanship. We well remember the time when the Superintendent of State Printing would negotiate directly with the workman, and as a result the State printing office could in those days boast of having the best body of skilled printers to be found in any city in the United States.

The Lee Association, of Alabama, a few days since celebrated its twenty-third anniversary at Mobile, with a grand street parade and banquet in the afternoon, and a ball at night wound up its festivities. Among the distinguished guests present were Dr. Seymour Bullock of the Grand Army of the Republic, and Col. Lucien B. Gould, of the Sons of Veterans. Many Northern men who fought under Grant and Sherman, and some who had been imprisoned in the death pens at Libby, occupied honored seats around the festal board. The tables were arranged to form three sides of a square, the officers and guests being seated at the head, and the blue and the gray alternating so far as possible. President Williams said the institution during the year had buried three of its members and had expended $1,500 in benefits. Dr. Seymour Bullock responded to the toast, "Grant, who stood between Lee and the Cabinet, and Sherman, who stood between Johnson and the Cabinet." Dr. Bullock referred to Lee as "a man who was admired by all people; a typical American; a true man; a man who acknowledged the claim the government had on him, but who thought Divine law higher than man's law, and the claim of his own flesh and blood stronger than that of any government." Several other toasts were responded to, among them one to Ulysses S. Grant, which was drunk standing. From men who have recently traveled through the South, we are informed that the prejudice against the North has become almost obliterated. A Grand Army man is looked upon, especially by the boys who wore the gray, as a friend and brother. The "lost cause" to them is no longer a righteous one, but a mistake. Their cemeteries are filled with premature graves, their property was destroyed, maimed men are to be seen everywhere, and there are a million or more widows and orphans unpensioned. The knowledge of these facts had much to do with the defeat of the so-called force bill, and none are better acquainted with the condition of our Southern brethren than the Pacific Coast Senators who lent their aid to its defeat.

It is rather small business that some of the most influential newspapers are engaged in, that of ridiculing State Legislatures controlled by the Farmers' Alliance. Fair play, gentlemen. Give the "hayseeds" a chance, or at least wait until they have done something to deserve it before condemning them.

REMINISCENCES OF A PIONEER.

Interesting Letter From an Early Mayor of Sacramento—Sutter and His Fort in 1849.

Hon. Demas Strong of Brooklyn, N. Y., visited Sacramento and other points on this coast in October and November last, and while here visited the office of THEMIS. Mr. Strong was a member of the first Council of this city. During the squatter riots of 1850 the Mayor, Hardin Biglow, was shot, and soon afterward died of cholera at San Francisco. From August of 1850, the time of the wounding of Biglow, until after his death and the election of a Mayor by the people, Mr. Strong filled the office of Mayor, at a very critical time in the history of the city. Mr. Strong returned to the East in 1851, but visited California in 1856 to stump it for Fremont. For many years he was an Alderman of Brooklyn, and also filled a seat in the New York State Senate. The following letter, written by Mr. Strong to Judge McKune, is of extreme interest, and it is with pleasure that through the kindness of the Judge we are permitted to give it publicity:

After parting with you at San Francisco we continued our journey southward, visiting the various watering places and sanitariums, also the famous Lick Observatory at Mount Hamilton, and finally took the Southern Pacific Railroad at Los Angeles and came home by the way of El Paso, San Antonio, Houston, New Orleans, Mobile, Montgomery, Atlanta, Washington and Philadelphia. By the by, should you ever go to San Jose please do not fail to visit the Lick Observatory. Of all the features of our trip that was the most interesting, the most instructive. Professor Holden and his assistants were very attentive, and we had the night exclusively to ourselves. What we saw and what we heard and felt, as well as the possibilities that crowded in upon us, created the most profound, the most enduring impressions. There is nothing that can be compared with it. The more you think of it the more it grows and fastens upon you. Every Californian, every American, should make Mount Hamilton his Mecca.

We found the route by which we came home unexpectedly pleasant. We had been warned of the great heat and dust we would be sure to encounter, and of the possibility of being "held up" by robbers, but the more they talked against it the more we determined to try it. Perhaps the old pioneer spirit, the love of adventure, was aroused. The greater the danger the greater the excitement. Generally these long journeys need something to vary their monotony. However, we had no such experience. Gentle showers of rain preceded us, falling at night and laying the dust, while light clouds tempered the sun by day. The mountain scenery was admirable, and on one occasion, as we were whirling across the great plains of Texas, we were treated to the most extensive, the most beautiful sunset we ever saw. I dare not attempt to describe it. Words would fail to express its grandeur, its beauty. It must be seen to be appreciated.

I think that during the winter and the early spring-time the Southern Pacific route would be preferable, for the reason that the heat is less powerful and the dust not so thick. I could, however, wish that the service was better. The meals on the cars, as well as at the stations, are not what they ought to be considering what they charge for them, and the rate of fare. The speed is not the fastest, being only twenty to twenty-two miles an hour, but they bring you through safely, which after all has a great deal to do with it. The more northern routes, however, are preferable for scenery and comfort in traveling, if there can be any such thing as comfort in traveling, especially during the warm and dry season.

One of the most agreeable features of our trip was the frequent meeting of old California pioneers. At Los Angeles, at San Jose, Santa Barbara and other places I came across men who had arrived in California at a very early day, some of them long before I did. They were generally full of good stories and loved to relate them. At Los Angeles I met one named Jim Fisher, who claimed to have known you. He said you had defended him at Sacramento in 1849, when he was tried for knocking down a man who had attempted to rob him.

Although we arrived home as early as December, yet have I not found an opportunity to examine the memorandums of the early days of Sacramento, as promised. I shall, however, take the matter up as early as possible. I hope to find something that may be useful to you. I have, in the meantime, carefully read the history of Sutter's Fort, as published in THEMIS, Vol. 1, No. 40. It is very interesting and it agrees with my recollection. It was about the 9th day of April, 1849, when I first visited that fort. The company to which I then belonged had arrived the day before at the embarcadero, on a sloop commanded by Capt. Martin. We had chartered the sloop at Yerba Buena to take us; with all our goods and traps, up the Sacramento river as far as the embarcadero, and here we were. General Sutter came down the next morning, mounted on horseback. Several vaqueros accompanied him, leading horses saddled and bridled. The General saluted us in military style, and then asked who was in command. Now the company consisted of thirteen members, and was officered by three trustees, I being one of the three. We advanced and were introduced to him with as much decorum and formality as we were capable of. We were all young men, and had but a few days before landed at San Francisco from the steamer Oregon. We regarded it as a great honor to be made acquainted with General Sutter, and were proud of our reception by him; besides, we had many hopes of profiting by his advice. At his invitation the trustees mounted, and followed the General to the fort. And here I would remark that although there was a surplus of horses, and some of the boys were quite willing to mount them, the General did not extend his invitation beyond the officers of the company. This, I believe, was a distinguishing characteristic, owing probably to his military training. We entered the fort and we were not allowed to leave it until after we had received ample evidence of the General's hospitality. It was the first fort of the kind that I had ever seen. It did not meet my expectations, and I said so to the General. He explained that it was built to resist Indians, not artillery charges. He did not undertake to go into details. There was very little said about the structure and its various features. I noticed the bastions, the shops, the buildings inside and the corral outside. The place was not occupied exclusively as a fort. There were parts of it being used for the storing or sale of goods, though I cannot recollect of seeing any purchasers around. The impressions it made on my mind were, that it had outlived its usefulness; that no effort was to be made to maintain it as a fort; that it had answered the purpose for which it had been constructed; that the rapidly changing condition of the country did not require its continuance, and that, as it was too far from the river for business purposes, it would in a short time be abandoned and go to ruin. Long after this time I used to halt my horse in the shadows of its walls, while traveling to and from Coloma, where I had a trading post. It never entered my head to make a drawing of it, or to measure any part of it. I may have made some entry in my diary. I shall hunt that up and see. Like all the rest of us, about that time, my mind was on something else, and we had but little space for sentiment. None of us then thought how dear the old fort would eventually become, else had we noted its every feature and kept well its history. One thing I do remember, and that is, a grand ball was given there, that there was a great disproportion of the sexes, and that if a gentleman expected to get a partner for the dance, he had to hustle around pretty lively. I have on several occasions talked with General Sutter in relation to our visit to the fort as above related. He was once President of the New York Society of California Pioneers, and that often brought me into his company. On one of our social entertainments, at Long Branch, in 1877, I related the circumstances of my introduction to the General and of his escorting us to the fort, and of his hospitable treatment. After I had finished speaking he approached me, and with tears in his eyes, said he was pleased to be reminded of the occurrence, that he remembered it all very well. "Ah!" said he, "those were days of great expectations, fond hopes, that I have never yet realized." Is it not lamentable to contemplate the possibilities and compare them with the results. Bayard Taylor was present as a guest. Noticing the agitation of the General he quietly asked the cause, and he made some memorandum in his note book. The General was quite feeble at that time and was easily affected. Well, the kind old man, too kind and too confiding for his own good, now rests in peace in the humble Lutheran burying ground at Litz, in the State of Pennsylvania. One of my daughters, not long since, visited the place, and knowing of the regard I had for him, she dropped a flower upon his grave. There are a good many of us still left; 1849 is not, after all, so very far back, but we are all standing close up to the shore of that river which our old friend has crossed, to return no more.

Please give my friendly regards to President La Rue when you meet him, and to other friends, not forgetting Mr. Phelps and Mr. Gunn.

HISTORY OF SHORTHAND.

Not a Modern Art by Any Means—How the Ancients Practiced Verbatim Reporting—Interesting Revelations of Mysterious Records—History of Modern Stenography.

Shorthand is generally accepted as a modern art and convenience, and therefore it may surprise most people to learn that not only its basic principles, but its practical use can be traced back to the earliest ages. It is by no means a modern invention. Its use can be found in the written records of the most ancient times of which history gives us any account.

Whence did this wondrous, mystic art arise
Of painting speech and speaking to the eyes,
That we, by tracing magic lines, are taught
How both to color and embody thought?

So questioned the Bard of Avon, but there is no answer to the query. The identity of the inventor of the art—for art it is—is lost with that of many other benefactors of mankind in the night of history. In the Bible we find many references to a system which, as will be shown later, must have been at least analogous to shorthand. As, for instance, Samuel xlv: 2:

My tongue is the pen of a ready writer.

And again, Jeremiah xxxvi: 4:

Baruch wrote from the mouth of Jeremiah all the words of the Lord upon a roll of a book, etc.

And these sentences have been interpreted to indicate the practical application of stenography in that early age.

But the celebrated Prof. Seidenschneider of Vienna, in an article in the Archives of Stenography, published in October, 1887, effectually disposed of the theory that the Jews of the Old or New Testament times possessed a knowledge of shorthand. They did have, however, after the exile, a script which, since the vowels were not written, was very short.

Among the Egyptians we find a shortened script, or rude attempt at shorthand, as early as 6,000 years ago, examples of which have been taken from the pyramid of King Chufu. From the simplified pictorial script developed the Hieratic or priest's script, which is shorter than our ordinary longhand. And from this developed the Demotic script, which was still more shortened.

But the Chinese also possessed a script, aside from the circumstantial pictorial script—which was invented by the Emperor Fohi 2650 B. C.—at at even earlier date, which was called Plant script, which is really not so short as our own longhand.

It cannot be said, however, that the ancients possessed a regular system of shorthand, with the exception of the Hindoo nations of India, though they had already established certain well-grounded principles, and it will be seen that they used the phonetic system as we do to-day. The Hindoos, that wonderful and mysterious race who have given so much and at the same time so little to the world, possessed the most perfect system of stenography known in ancient times, and it is a curious fact that the so-called system of Arabic numerals (1, 2, 3, 4, etc.) is the invention of the Hindoos, notwithstanding the Arabs have assumed the credit for it. But even in the case of the Hindoos there is no good reason to believe that, aside from arbitrary characters which may have been used in their commercial pursuits, they had a knowledge of shorthand writing in the proper sense of the term.

The Greeks also had a system of stenography, the earliest evidence of which is supplied by fragments of a stone which were brought to light several years ago during the excavations on the Acropolis at Athens, and which, according to the opinion of Prof. Ulrich Koehler, an authority on Greek antiquities, date as far back as the fourth century B. C. The inscriptions on this stone were reconstructed by Prof. Theodore Gomper in Vienna. This is one of the earliest authentic attempts at shorthand known to us. The signs in this system resemble very much those used by John Filbury in the twelfth century, and those by Timothy Bright in 1588 and Lady Sophie Scott in 1830 in Vienna.

In the third and fourth centuries after Christ, shorthand was well understood and quite generally practiced in Greece, but its use never became so general as in Rome at the time of Cicero, in the first century B. C., one of whose freedmen, Marcus Tullius Tiro by name, invented a system of abbreviations generally known as "Tironian Notes," which was extensively used for reporting the speeches delivered in the Senate. It is to these notes that we owe some of the greatest orations of the renowned statesmen of those days.

With the decline of the Roman Empire, stenography disappeared from public life. During the Middle Ages it was only cultivated in the monasteries, and but for the old monks and friars, the Roman stenography would have been lost to the world. The universal ignorance and consequent superstition not only prevented the cultivation of this art, but forbade it as witchcraft and burned the most valuable papers on the funeral pyres of the victims. The case of the learned Abbott Frithemius of Frithenheim may be instanced as a notable example. He was burned with his MSS. by the order of the Christian Electoral Prince Frederick III, of the Palatinate. Stenographers were actually burned to death as witches.

The sixteenth century brought better times. Luther and the reformation cleared away the mists of superstition, and art and science began a new and thriving life. But it was in England, the birthplace of parliamentarianism, and the most fertile for the seeds of reformation, that shorthand was resurrected a little over 300 years ago, an event which three years ago was celebrated by the largest gathering of shorthand experts ever brought together. The desire to preserve for posterity the speeches of statesmen, as well as the sermons of great pulpit speakers, gave birth to a continuous line of stenographic systems. These may be divided into three distinct classes, as follows: From Timothy Bright, 1587, to Mason, 1682; then came Samuel Taylor, 1786; and finally Isaac Pitman, 1837, whose celebrated system still enjoys so wide a popularity. Mason's system, though defective in many respects, furnished the basis for many works of minor importance. Thomas Guernsey, published about the year 1730, surpassed in practical value all its predecessors, and was officially recognized by the appointment of its author as shorthand writer at the Old Bailey, London's celebrated criminal court and prison. Guernsey's method is still used by some of the reporters in the House of Commons.

The first French stenographic system appeared in 1651, by Cossord, under the title, "Methode pour ecrire aussi vite qu'on parle." (Method to write as fast as one speaks.) It did not fulfil its promise. The most popular system in France is the one invented by Duploye, which has also been adapted to English.

But as England is the birthplace, so Germany is the home of modern shorthand. The English methods were found too cumbersome, and many writers attempted new systems for the German. It remained, however, for Francis Haver Gabelsberger to invent the first practical German system, which was published in 1837, and became immediately popular. But Gabelsberger's system still had many faults, and several new adaptations of it were devised, each of more or less value. The best system that has yet appeared is that of Henry August William Stolze, which was immediately taken up by the best writers and has nearly superseded all others in Europe. It has been cleverly adapted to the English and is said to be the shortest and simplest system of stenography extant. St. Louis possesses the first society for the dissemination of this system which has been organized in this country. It was formed by a few enthusiasts who practice stenography as an art and teach the Stolze system to members free of charge. The society is of a social character and meets twice a week in pleasant rooms to practise shorthand, listen to interesting discussions on the art in all its branches and phases, and enjoy social intercourse. It is probably the only society of the kind in the country, and is a unique and valuable institution whose influence is rapidly spreading. It is known as the Stolze Stenographic Association of St. Louis.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

Burlesque actresses who are in a stew are probably poured into their costumes.

An elk can change his horns every ten weeks. For some Elks this means a long time between drinks.

Sadie Martinot was the recipient of at least a cartload of flowers during the run of Dr. Bill in Boston.

There is a story that Miss Kate Claxton is organizing a big company to play The Two Orphans straight through to the Pacific Coast.

When the play is o'er, and the curtain falls,
She'll sweetly smile on you,
And afterward, when the waiter calls,
She'll say, "Give me a stew."

Aubrey Boucicault, son of Dion Boucicault, who is just about to be married, has written a new play expressly for his mother, in which Mrs. Boucicault will appear with her daughter Nina and the author.

Singing operas to an American audience in a foreign language is bad enough, but certainly the climax of absurdity is reached in singing ballads in a foreign language, when the English repertory is so rich in beautiful ballad music.

The late Irma Marie, the Paris opera singer, was once a woman of marvelous beauty, with flashing black eyes and a superb figure, but before she retired from the stage she had become thin and haggard, a mere wreck of her former self.

It was at a concert by a great pianist. He had stopped suddenly in the playing of a brilliant fortissimo passage that was supposed to have charmed all the audience. But the tones of a female voice rang out from the balcony, "We always fry ours in butter."

Olivia Golibart, the young Baltimore society girl who is about to venture into theatrical life, is a pretty and rather small brunette. Her eyes are dark, and her hair, black as ink, falls to her waist. In figure she is attractive, and she dances well. She has appeared in many amateur theatrical performances in her native city.

A supernatural idiot has formulated in print the theory that opera in the English language can never be a success in New York because Italians, who are fine singers, cannot, or will not, learn the English tongue. This imbecile uses as his illustration the fact that although Campanini has been in America a great many years he cannot talk United States.—Dramatic News.

Book Chat.

The cook who lighted the fire with the manuscript of Carlyle's "French Revolution," died in England recently.

First Book—You won't be in the store long. You have such a fancy cover. Second Book—Yes; I'm bound to sell.

"Scum," by the Spanish writer Valdes, is a telling satire on capitalism, and offers some strong arguments in favor of socialistic progress.

Robert Louis Stevenson says that he intends to end his days in Samoa. He has closed out all his affairs in England and Scotland, and his mother will join himself and family in the new South Sea Island home shortly.

Jules Simon, the venerable French author, does most of his writing in bed. He lies flat on his back and writes on a tablet held above him, and in spite of the awkward position his manuscript is a marvel of neatness.

James Lane Allen, the Kentucky novelist, is a professor of Latin in Bethany College. He lives at Lexington, and has a house in Cincinnati also, dividing his time between the two cities. He began his career with a desire to become eminent in comparative philology.

Oscar Wilde has grown fat to a point beyond the grotesque. He wears his hair in straggly locks and has deserted the esthetic movements, but he has become conventionally more agreeable as a companion and an entertainer. He is superintending one of his plays in New York.

Jerome is accused of imitating American humor. If he is guilty of this we can only say it is probably the best thing an Englishman can do. In his dramatic work this rising writer is particularly successful. Dr. Bill has played his New Lamps and Old, and that brilliant little fore-piece, Sunset, has been used as a prelude to Dr. Bill.

Edgar Fawcett, the literateur, was stopped by a poetic young woman the other day. "I know you," she said. "Do you?" "Yes, and I want to know you better." "Yes." "And—oh, there's my husband." And she skipped. The next day Mr. Fawcett received a package in which was a silk handkerchief and a gold locket the petite young woman had stolen during the conversation, and a note saying, "You're not a bit fly." The history of women in journalism dates back to 1772, when Clementine Reid printed and edited the Virginia Gazette, a paper devoted to the colonial cause. Two years later Mrs. H. Boyle started a royalist paper, having the same name. The latter was the first paper to publish the Declaration of Independence. Since 1850 women have been editing departments in weekly papers, and for 20 years they have served upon the city and correspondent staffs of daily papers.

Captain John Smith is supposed to have been the author of the first American book. His account of his voyages to New England was published in England in 1616, and the "Generall Historie" in 1626. Nathaniel Morton, secretary of Plymouth colony, was the author of "New England's Memoriall, or a Brief Relation of the Most Memorable and Remarkable Passages of the Providence of God, Manifested to the Planters of New England," which was published at Cambridge, 1669. The Bay State Psalm Book is believed to have been the first book printed in America, but it is not known who compiled it. The honor of author of the first American book is generally given to Morton.

Professional Chat.

A funeral bird having in its mouth the inscription "Quoth the raven, 'nevermore,'" stands at the consulting-room door of a prominent Philadelphia physician.

Dr. Ponderous—Your husband is in comatose state, madam. Mrs. Nolittle—Gracious! How can you tell so quick? I didn't know they had states over there same as here.

The brightest and the dullest talker in the United States Senate will step down and out on the 4th of March. Without Ingalls and Blair, who will be the attractions? Can the Farmers' Alliance furnish them?

General Sherman the other evening at the Yale alumni dinner in New York, having been welcomed as usual by "Marching Through Georgia," remarked feelingly in his little speech: "I have often thought that when I was marching to the sea it would have been well had I marched on into it."

Think of a Chief Justice who keeps thirty-seven razors, and has them all in good order! Not long ago Chief Justice Paxson of the Pennsylvania Supreme Court left thirty-seven razors at Borneman's barber shop in Altoona to be honed. He receives many guests at his farm in Bucks county, and as the place is remote from a tonsorial artist he supplies his male visitors with the usual chin-scraping appliances.

American dentists are very popular in England. Their advertisements are always to be seen in the London Times and other English papers. It is also to be noticed that English dentists announce their readiness to "perform all operations with the latest American improvements." In Paris, likewise, American dentists are greatly favored with French patronage, and several of them have made fortunes by their skill.

Ex-Senator Ingalls' mode of life has always been an exceedingly simple one. He regarded the ostentatious phase of entertaining in Washington with amused contempt, and when he ventured into society his manner was as unpretentious, easy and suave as that of an accomplished European diplomat. The Senator lived in a boarding house while he was in Washington, but it was a boarding house of a high order. Mr. Ingalls kept two rooms on the second floor which were literally overrun with papers, books, reviews and pamphlets. In the smaller of the two rooms there was an unpretentious little iron bed, and the whole apartment looked the abode of a student of affairs.

Here is a good story of Justin McCarthy. It refers to the day when the Galaxy was alive. Sheldon & Co. were the publishers of the magazine. McCarthy had submitted a story. One day he said to Mr. Sheldon: "I have come to see if you will take that story I offered to the Galaxy." "Yes," cordially responded Mr. Sheldon, "and sixty more like it." Time passed and one day McCarthy walked into the Galaxy office with an imposing pile of manuscript under his arm. "What is that?" asked Mr. Sheldon. McCarthy laid the bundle of manuscript upon the publisher's desk and replied, "Here are the sixty stories you ordered on the occasion of my last visit." He got a check covering the whole sixty.

NOTES.

People who drink hot coffee after eating ice cream, as too many do, are warned by a German physician, that they "court apoplexy."

Articles of food that ought to be cooked in a ten-acre lot without any roof, and miles from a dwelling, are cabbage, turnips, and cauliflower.

The last page of the Congressional Record is devoted daily to the publication of the places of Divine worship. All great men are Christians, Ingersoll excepted.

Turkish soldiers are very poor marksmen. Recent target contests in the Turkish army demonstrated the fact that not one soldier in twenty could hit a man at twenty paces.

The Folsom Telegraph has entered a new volume, the 36th year since its advent. Thad McFarland has made the Telegraph a bright paper, devoted to the local interest.

If you want notoriety write a bad book, a naughty play, break some of the commandments, do anything that will make Satan grin and the angles weep, and you will get there.

A great many of our people are cowardly, and like ground-hogs, frightened by their own shadows. This is why they submit to the iron rod held over them by the bond creditors.

What are political parties good for, except to give the people the opportunity of better government? And how can this be done, except by getting capable and honest men to administer the government?

Some of our extremely honest financiers are so very earnest in the welfare of the city, that they cannot even take a hint. They manage to allow certain persons to take about everything there is in the treasury, however.

A German physician proposes that the manufacturers of preserved meat should be compelled to stamp their cans with a legible date mark. For a year or so, he says, canned meat may remain perfectly wholesome, but after that it deteriorates in a way defying alike precaution and explanation.

A prominent photographer expresses the opinion that the gallery of the future will have no skylight. A high room, with the north wall entirely of glass and a roof open to the sky, will produce the best results. The inside painted in light color gives admirable illumination, without the disadvantages of sunlight.

We are told by a very knowing person that blonde women are destined to be happy this spring by reason of the prevalence of blue corn flowers as the trimming for hats. Somebody decides all this months ahead, and at this moment thousands of busy fingers are at work in the French quarter turning out the bloomy splendors that are to adorn Easter bonnets.

Work should be enthusiastic. There should be an ideal. Labor should be elevated to the dignity and beauty of an art. The carpenter who planes his boards on the underside which will not be seen; the painter who paints that which will be out of sight; the physician who prescribes for the pauper as carefully as for the millionaire; the mechanic who will not let a job go from his hand until it is finished to perfection—all these dignify their toil.

Tradition has it that the last assemblage in the Hall of Tara took place in the year A. D. 544. The great triennial council of the Irish nation was held there for several centuries previously, but because a criminal who had fled for safety to the monastery of St. Ruan had been dragged to the hall and executed, the holy Abbot and the monks cried aloud against the sacrifice and pronounced a curse on its walls. "From that day," says the old chronicler, "no kings ever again sat at Tara."

During 1890 thirty-nine pictures were sold in London for $7,000 and upward, thirty of them being works of British artists. The highest price was $37,000 for Turner's "Sheerness," which was sold for less than $1,000 in 1842. Paul Potter's "Daisy Farm" brought $30,000. Thirty Landseers, from the Wells collection, brought $215,000, the highest price being $23,000. Gainsborough's "Lord A. Hamilton" brought $22,500, and Romney's "Circe" $20,000, and Wilkie's "Distraining for Rent," $11,500.

The bill for the relief of Geo. Nelson, who was so unjustly imprisoned in the State prison for thirteen months, should pass without any opposition. The amount allowed is only $3,600, which is a mere trifle considering the great wrong done this innocent man. The great State of California cannot afford to permit this wrong to remain without some requital. While it is a fact that this bill was introduced by Mr. Bruner among the first, it still hangs fire, although favorably reported by the Committee on Claims. Gentlemen of the Senate and Assembly, do not allow this bill to be defeated.

It is passing strange that the people of this city cannot be brought to realize who are the enemies of the city's prosperity. Year after year we have borne our burden, and allowed the weight to increase through the agency of the pretended friends. The experience of last week should be sufficient warning for the future. Trustee McLaughlin is deserving of great credit for his timely action in defeating the wiles of the bondholders to still hold their grip of death upon the city. When Senator Sprague's bills to define what "revenue" means, become the laws, then will a first lease of prosperity dawn upon us.

The Abghasians, a mountain tribe of Caucasasia, follow the very primitive custom of stealing wives for themselves. If a young man kidnaps a girl he likes, he makes her his wife whether she is agreeable to the match or not. This gives rise to frequent fights between the families of the tribe, which never end without human sacrifices. But if the kidnaped girl likes the man who has taken her, she acts as the Sabinian women in ancient Rome did. When her family declare war against her groom she runs to meet them and to appease them, and if they don't listen to her entreaties she joins her husband in fight against her own kin.

A sensation has been caused in the Germany Foreign Office by a snit brought by a broker named Jacobssohn against a barrister named Neuern for 2,000 marks commission for securing Neuern a position in the service. Neuern has been dismissed on account of the scandal. If every one who secures public favor through such means in this country were treated in the same manner, it might work a radical reform in the practice of bribery in attaining place. For years it has been the practice to exact from persons holding positions, a percentage of their salaries by the alleged "bosses" or their agents. The present administration in this State has thus far been free from these imputations.

The San Francisco Wave, in speaking of the late Palmer case (which, by the way, was decided in favor of Palmer, ex-Senator Fair being the prosecutor), says: "H. J. Palmer has to thank his attorney for his acquittal. General A. L. Hart made a remarkable fight for Palmer, and his closing speech was a great effort, from a rhetorical as well as a logical point of view. Mr. Hart, gifted with a fine intellect and remarkable powers of comprehension, grasps with great facility the points of law submitted to him. He is a natural lawyer, argues lucidly and eloquently and can examine a witness to perfection. He is one of the ablest lawyers in the State."

In examining the most skillfully made counterfeit notes there is but one defect found in them, and that is in their size. Counterfeit bills are necessarily a little smaller than the genuine. Government plates, which it is impossible to steal, are somewhat larger than the bills made therefrom, on account of allowing for the shrinkage of the paper. In making counterfeit money a new note is pasted on a polished steel plate, and transfer paper is placed over it. The work is then traced with a fine pencil, and afterward marked through on the steel plate with a sharp engraver. The plate thus made is, of course, just the size of the note, and the bills made from it, when dampened, shrink, making them somewhat smaller than genuine currency.

At intervals we note that some policeman or petty officer, constitutes himself judge, jury and executioner. The stupid as well as criminal blunder of a policeman in San Francisco, in shooting down a young man because he did not stop at the officer's command, is nothing less than murder—assassination is the correct term. Many persons, because they may be clothed in a little authority or wear a star, have an idea that they can do about as their sweet will dictates. Simply because an officer imagines some crime has been committed, gives him no right to become an executioner. There are but few and exceptional cases where an officer has a right to kill a prisoner or one charged with crime. The action of policeman Cavanaugh in killing young May, in San Francisco, is absolutely indefensible. Police officers should be taught that their duties are circumscribed by law, and that they have no right to invade the sacred rights of the citizen, or to kill him on their mere suspicion.

Sample Copies.

For some weeks past I have been mailing a large number of specimen copies of THEMIS to old-time friends in El Dorado county. I ask a careful criticism of its merits, and if found worthy would be pleased to receive their subscriptions.

J. H. MILLER.

[Written for THEMIS.]

Converted by a Child.

A few evenings since the writer was sitting in the reading-room of the Golden Eagle Hotel an interested listener to an interesting conversation between several intelligent and educated gentlemen. The discussion was on religious topics and the majority favored Ingersoll's theories.

One insisted that the Pentateuch was simply the record of a barbarous people, in which is found a great number of the ceremonies of savagery, many absurd and unjust laws, and thousands of ideas inconsistent with known and demonstrated facts. He concluded by saying that it almost seemed a crime to teach that this record was written by inspired men.

Another said there was a time when a falsehood, fulminated from the pulpit, smote like a sword, but, the supply having greatly exceeded the demand, clerical misrepresentation has at last become almost an innocent amusement. Christianity cannot live in peace with any other form of faith. If that religion be true, there is but one Savior, one inspired book, and but one little narrow grass-grown path that leads to heaven. Such a religion is necessarily uncompromising, unreasoning, aggressive and insolent.

Yes, chimed in another, we read the pagan sacred books with profit and delight. With myth and fable we are ever charmed. These myths were born of hopes, and fears, and tears, and smiles, and they were touched and colored by all there is of joy and grief between the rosy dawn of birth, and death's sad night. They clothed even the faults and frailties of men. In them, the winds and waves, springs, mountain streams, woods and perfumed dells were haunted by a thousand fairy forms. They thrilled the veins of spring with tremulous desire; made tawny summer's billowed breast the throne and home of love; filled autumn's arms with sun-kissed grapes and gathered sheaves; and pictured winter a weak and as feeble old king.

Yes, remarked another, these myths, though false, are beautiful, and have for many ages and in countless ways enriched the heart and kindled thought. For my part, I care nothing for what the church says, except in so far as it accords with my reason; and the Bible is nothing to me, only in so far as it agrees with what I think or know. Theology is not what we know about God, but what we do not know about nature. No one pretends that Shakespeare was inspired, and yet all the writers of the books of the Old Testament put together could not have produced Hamlet.

During the above conversation one gentleman in the party had been a patient listener, but had said not a word. He was called upon by one of the party for his views. In response, in substance, he said: "Many years ago I was born in New England. I was brought up by a good and religious mother, who sleeps to-day beneath the shade of a weeping willow in a New Hampshire churchyard. She told me the stories of the Bible, and when I was old enough had me read the sacred book entirely through from Genesis to Revelation. She took me to the Sabbath-school, taught me the Commandments and the Lord's Prayer and placed my feet in the proper path. Like you, gentlemen, who had a similar youthful experience, I came to California while a young man. I followed the example of all Californians, became a frequenter of drinking houses and gaming saloons, neglected the church, quit reading the Bible, and while I did not become an infidel, I became worse—a scoffer of religion. A year ago, gentlemen, I was in full accord with all the sentiments uttered this evening. I was an admirer of Bob Ingersoll and Tom Paine, but I was converted as suddenly as was St. Paul, and at a time and place, and by a person, the narration of which I know will not fail to interest you. I went home one evening about 8 o'clock. I opened the front door softly with my night key, so as not to disturb the inmates. As I was tiptoeing through the carpeted hallway I passed my little daughter's bedroom. A sight met my eyes that transfixed me for the moment, and I was converted in less time than I have been speaking to you. Kneeling by her bedside in her snow white night dress, her hands clasped in front of her, her eyes looking heavenward, in her clear, childish voice, full of emotion and fervor, she said: 'Now I lay me down to sleep, I pray the Lord my soul to keep; and if I should die before I wake, I pray the Lord my soul to take. God bless papa; dear mamma, who is in heaven; my two sisters, my little brother, and make Mamie a good little girl.' She finished by repeating the Lord's Prayer, arose looking more angelic than I ever saw her, turned off the gas and was soon a sleeping innocent. Her mother, who has been sleeping in the cemetery for several years, taught Mamie that little prayer. Would I shake that child's faith in her God? Would I endeavor to make her believe there was no efficacy in prayer? No, gentlemen, I would not for all the wealth of the Rothschilds. The religion of my mother is good enough for me."

There was silence in the room after the gentleman had finished, and one by one they separated without again alluding to the subject. On Christmas Day Mamie received a handsome casket, inside of which was the card of one of those present. On the opposite side was written, "Another convert—God bless Mamie and make her a good little girl." M.

Lofty Articles.

A lady subscriber, in renewing her subscription to THEMIS, writes as follows: "As a paper I have always found THEMIS filled with lofty articles, suitable for the child, the lady or the right pert young man to read with edifying results. At the present time and for years past the State press has become so corrupt, its pages so soiled with crime and degradation as to render our daily papers unfit reading matter to enter Christian homes. Sensationalism is the theme of modern editors, assailing the characters of ordinarily good men without positively knowing their faults or errors, jumping at quick conclusions, a surmise or probability being their only basis. In my mind, this is all wrong. Were we not to read of the crime, the infamy of humanity, especially in large cities, we simple country people, judging from our own calm, unpretentious surroundings, would, as the good people of 'Arcadia,' judge the world by the serenity of our own lives. I hope you will not change the course of THEMIS, but keep its bright pages unsullied and free from sensationalism and promiscuous subjects."

In With the Rogues.

Everybody knows James Woodburn. For twenty years he has been traveling through El Dorado, Amador, Calaveras and Placer counties as a drummer, often carrying large amounts of money. The other day James B. Hume, Wells Fargo's detective, said to him: "How is it, 'Jim,' that you never get 'stood up.' You are the only one that seems to escape." Woodburn looked at him, laughed, and said: "Why, Hume, I am in with those fellows. Whenever I meet them I treat them, and whenever they are broke I stake them, and, of course, they are not going to bother me." Mr. Woodburn then related an incident concerning a man who is now serving out a life sentence for murder. He waylaid Woodburn as the latter was driving through a dense forest, had his gun raised, his finger on the trigger, and ready to fire, when he discovered that it was Woodburn, a man who had treated him the day before and bought him a meal's victuals. He came out of the brush, accosted Woodburn, and told the latter of his narrow escape. Woodburn took him in his buggy to the next village, gave him five dollars and advised him to be honest.

Republican Primary.

AT A MEETING OF THE REPUBLICAN CITY Central Committee, held Tuesday, February 10, 1891, it was

Resolved, That a Republican Primary Election be held in the City of Sacramento, on Saturday, February 14th,

under the provision of the Porter Primary Election Law, to elect 160 Delegates, to meet on Tuesday, February 17, 1891, to nominate candidates for the following city offices: Third Trustee, City Auditor, City Assessor, City Collector, Fire Commissioner (long term), Fire Commissioner (short term).

Resolved, That the qualifications required of voters at said Primary Election, in addition to those prescribed by law, shall be that the voter shall have voted for Markham and Redick and will support the Republican City Ticket.

Resolved, That caucuses be held in each ward on Friday evening, February 13th, at 8 o'clock, to select delegates to the said Convention.

FIRST WARD.

From Front to Fifth streets, 17 delegates—Polls at 1005 Third street. W. A. Anderson, Inspector; A. J. Senatz and R. Arnold, Judges.

From Fifth to Seventh streets, 13 delegates—Polls, 614 J street. Frank Van Guelder, Inspector, Wm. M. Petrie and John Barrett, Judges.

SECOND WARD.

From Front to Fourth streets, 16 delegates—Polls, southeast corner Third and K streets. J. J. C. Fitzgerald, Inspector; Emil Heinrichs and Frank McMurtry, Judges.

From Fourth to Sixth streets, 14 delegates—Polls, Fifth and K streets. Frank Wickwire, Inspector; James McKenna and Fred Snyder, Judges.

THIRD WARD.

From Seventh to Twelfth streets, 15 delegates—Polls, Ninth street, between I and J. Dugald Gillis, Inspector; Henry O. Tubbs and George Neuman, Judges.

From Twelfth to Eighteenth streets, 19 delegates—Polls, Fourteenth and G streets. E. I. Robinson, Inspector; Frank Hickman and J. B. Gilbert, Judges.

From Eighteenth to Thirty-first streets, 16 delegates—Polls, Twentieth and H streets. A. L. Frost, Inspector; Wilbur P. Smith and Joseph Berresford, Judges.

FOURTH WARD.

From Sixth to Tenth streets, 20 delegates—Polls at Central House, K street, between Eighth and Ninth (south side). W. B. Maydwell, Inspector; J. M. Gattman and S. W. Butler, Judges.

From Tenth to Nineteenth streets, 20 delegates—Polls at New Pavilion. J. J. McKinnon, Inspector; J. P. Slater and John Ryan, Judges.

From Nineteenth to Thirty-first streets, 10 delegates—Polls, Twenty-fifth and O streets. Robert Parker, Inspector; J. J. Wingard and C. E. Dutton, Judges.

A. J. JOHNSTON, Secretary.

LOCAL BRIEVITIES.

Work on the new postoffice building is progressing finely.

Many new improvements are being made at Agricultural Park.

During the past year Sacramento has expended over $100,000 on her streets.

Judge Cravens is a "holy terror" to criminals. He seems to be the right man in the right place.

The membership of the Young Men's Christian Association has doubled in the city within the past year.

The American Steam Laundry employs seventy-five people, yet, strange to say, its patrons are not those who waged the anti-Chinese war.

All ladies wear more or less whalebone. Our Mayor would do credit to himself by getting a little more backbone, especially on bond questions.

If you want a good business college education go to Bainbridge, J street, between Tenth and Eleventh. The most complete course for the least money.

Weinstock & Lubin are putting up a magnificent brick building at the corner of Fourth and K streets. No firm in the State is better known or patronized.

The photograph from which H. D. Gamble's cut was made, which appears in the advertising columns, was taken by I. Boysen, the well known photographer.

Police Judge Cravens is apprised of the fact that "Lumber" Green and all of his class are an undesirable element in this community. They should either be in the county jail, or the county of Yolo—Yolo preferred.

Who is to be Auditor, is asked on every hand. It is said E. H. McKee will try to retain his office by running on the Citizens' ticket. Ed. had a very close call at the last election, but all, even his enemies, must admit that he has made a good and efficient official.

L. L. Lewis & Co. are deserving of great credit for the electric railway that they have put in operation during the past week. Sacramento can boast now of having the finest electric street railway in the world. Mr. Lewis has purchased all the late improvements. The citizens appreciate his efforts and show it by their liberal patronage.

Since the name of Capt. J. D. Young has been mentioned for Third Trustee, he has been approached by hundreds of his friends asking him to stand in. The Captain is undecided. He desires to see the party in this city united, and does not want the nomination unless he can have a united party at his back. The Captain is the best man yet named for the place, and he undoubtedly will get it without opposition.

One of the boycotters was passing a Chinese wash-house yesterday. The proprietor of the latter was standing in the doorway. Noticing that the passer-by had a very much soiled shirt he asked to wash it, when he received the following reply: "No, me union man. No like Chinaman." The Celestial smiled childlike and bland, and said: "Me alle same you. Me no takum Bee." It is unnecessary to add that the shirt was taken off then and there, and that that wash-house has another customer.

A Sad Case.

Mrs. M. Cuddy, who was divorced from her brutal husband about two months ago, on account of his cruel treatment and failure to provide, is living in a very destitute condition, with six helpless children, at the southeast corner of Tenth and C streets. Mrs. Cuddy is a very deserving lady and her circumstances appeal strongly to the sympathies of the charitably disposed people of this community. Some effort should be made by the Court to enforce its order for allowance of alimony, amounting to $25 per month; a very trifling sum, perhaps, to the wretch who brought about this desolation in a home, but which would go a great way towards aiding these worse than fatherless children.

The Carriage Wheel Problem.

The oft repeated question, "Does the top of a wheel move faster than the bottom?" is answered as follows by Popular Science News: The top of a carriage wheel moves faster, with reference to the observer, than the bottom, because in addition to its movement of rotation it has the direct forward movement of the carriage as a whole. The bottom of the wheel moves in an opposite direction to that of the wheel itself, and as the two motions partially neutralize each other the bottom part appears to move past the observer more slowly than the top. Instantaneous photographs of moving carriages often show this very clearly, the top of the wheel being blurred while the lower part is quite distinct. Of course, in the case of a fixed wheel—a pulley on a shaft, for instance—all parts would move with the same velocity.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

On Monday evening The Swedish Ladies will give another of their unique concerts, at the Clunie Opera House.

Patti Rosa drew good houses on Tuesday and Wednesday in Imp and Margery Daw. While there is little literary merit in either, the little soubrette displayed a marked degree of artistic skill in each of these creations of fancy.

Lotta has again come before the public. It is needless to speak of her to old Californians. With us she has been the queen of comedy in the true sense. All others are mere copies—imitators. While on the stage Lotta reigns supreme. Last night we had the pleasure of welcoming her at the Metropolitan in Musette. To-night she will appear in Ina, a new comedy, abounding in wit and music.

The following attractions are booked for this city: Clemenceau Case—Sybil Johnstone as "Iza," February 16 and 17. Fred. Warde and Mrs. D. P. Bowers, February 19, 20 and 21. Goodyear, Elitch & Schilling's Minstrels, February 23 and 24. Corinne, February 27 and 28. Running Wild, March 2 and 3. Sea King, March 6 and 7. A Barrel of Money, March 9 and 10. Marie Wainwright, March 12, 13 and 14. All the Comforts of Home, March 23 and 24. The Little Tycoon Opera Co., March 27 and 28. Hyde Novelty and Specialty Co., March 30 and 31.

A healthy immigration has commenced flowing into El Dorado county. It is no doubt the finest fruit country in the world.

FLASHES.

Legends and Traditions of Many Nations Concerning Dwarfs.

The dwarfs proper are of two kinds—generous and kindly, malicious and destructive. Sometimes they do harm to man to preserve their own property, as that “hill man” who bribed the chamois hunter to unwelcome idleness by a promise of a chamois every week, and then toppled him over the cliffs when, wearied with his inaction, he broke his promise and went out to shoot for himself. And again they do well for the mere pleasure of doing well, just as benevolent old uncles in the fairy tales of social life come down from the clouds called Australia or India, and endow everybody with wealth got by means as magical as the discovery of underground treasures or the seizure of the little people's gold plate and jewels. But, above all, they do ill if mocked at or entrapped.

When the wretched jokers made the rock where the dwarfs were accustomed to sit burning hot—when the miserable shepherd strewed ashes under his cherry tree, so that he might discover the shape of the dwarfish feet that came tripping along as light as birds, while the funny little hands did the work of plowmen and husbandmen—then these foolish peepers, worse than Peeping Tom of Coventry, paid for their folly in purse and person. If, however, the folk received the wee man kindly, or did good service to the wandering moss wyfie, health and happiness, prosperity and preservation became theirs, and the very elements obeyed the small hand of the grateful elf.

Everywhere we find legends and traditions of these wee people. How these legends were first set afloat no one now can tell. What basis of fact is in them is just as great a mystery. Say that small races of men have been found—we know something about them now, both historically and ethnologically—they are not close enough to fable to explain and justify. The small Lapps—the small earthmen—the low statured tribes of India, do not account for the traditions of wise and potent dwarfs who can do more than mortal men, though they look so feeble and are so misshapen.

Somehow these wee people have grown out of men's minds in all nations, from east to west, and the differences between them are to be traced to climate rather than origin. The African Yimboos, white in color and but two feet high in stature, are but the Icelandic duergar in another dress. The brownie of England and the Nis of the farther north are but the Irish leprechaun and the German kobold, like Himmelmännchen and Hildemuhlen, for example, and the same story is found in various disguises.

Glories of Ages Past.

There are between sixty and seventy ruined cities in Yucatan, so far as they have been discovered, says the Globe-Democrat. Within a radius of 100 miles from Merida are such magnificent examples as Mayapan, Ake, Chichen-Itza, Kabah and Labna; but none is more interesting and grand than Uxmal, about 76 miles by road travel from Merida. By far the finest building in the city, both from its commanding position on a lofty eminence and the completeness of its preservation, is the Royal Palace—otherwise known as the Casa de Gobernador, in Spanish. It stands on the topmost of three terraces of earth—once, perhaps, faced with stone, but now crumbled, broken and in a state of heterogeneous decay.

The lowermost and largest is 575 feet long; the second 545 feet long, 250 wide and 25 feet high, while the third and last is 360 feet in length, 30 in breadth and 19 in height, and supports the building, which has a front of 322 feet, with a depth of only 39, and a height of but 25 feet. It is entirely of stone, without ornament to the height of about 10 feet, where there is a wide cornice, above which the wall is a bewildering maze of sculpture. The roof was flat and once covered with cement, in the opinion of some travelers, but is now covered with tropical plants, trees and verdure. There are three large doorways through the eastern wall, about 8 feet square, giving entry into a series of apartments, the largest of which is 60 feet long and 27 deep, divided into two rooms by a thick wall. The ceiling of each room is a triangular arch, capped by flat blocks, at a height of 25 feet above the floor. The latter, like the walls and jambs of the doorways, is of smooth-faced stones, that may once have been covered with cement.

Not Quite Dead.

An old Indian soldier tells this story of a mule's last kick:
In the First Division, Second Corps, we had a mule noted for his wonderful kicking powers. In fact, he was ready to give any one a kick, upon all occasions. On the road to Richmond he got his leg broken in a bridge, and was taken out of the team and shot, and was, to all appearances, dead, when a soldier ran up, seized the mule by the tail, and exclaimed:
“Now kick!”
And the mule, having just one kick, let him have it, breaking the soldier's jaw, and sent him rolling in the ditch. The soldier never heard the last of being kicked by a dead mule.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California.—In the matter of the estates and guardianship of Mary F. and Walter J. Hennessy, minors. Elizabeth Hennessy, the guardian of the estates of Mary F. Hennessy and Walter J. Hennessy, minors, having filed her petition herein, duly verified, praying for an order of sale of the real estate of said decedent, for the purposes therein set forth, it is therefore ordered by the said Court that all persons interested in the estate of said deceased appear before the said Superior Court on the 6th day of March, 1891, at 10 o'clock A. M. of said day, at the Courtroom of said Superior Court, at County of Sacramento, State of California, to show cause why an order should not be granted to the said guardian to sell so much of the real estate of the said minors as shall be necessary. And that a copy of this order be published at least once a week for three successive weeks in THEMIS, a newspaper printed and published in said county.

W. C. VAN FLEET, Judge of the Superior Court. Dated February 4th, 1891. C. T. JONES & MATT. F. JOHNSON, Attorneys for Petitioner.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California.—In the matter of Warren Starr, an insolvent debtor.—Warren Starr, having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, from which it appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said Warren Starr is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said Warren Starr, insolvent debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent or to deliver any property belonging to such insolvent to him, or to any person, firm, corporation or association for his use; and the said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered, that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Hon. A. P. Catlin, Judge of the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the Courtroom of said Court, in the County of Sacramento, on the 13th day of March 1891, at 10 o'clock, A. M. of that day, to prove their debts and choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered, that the order be published in the THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation, published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published, before the day set for the meeting of creditors. And it is further ordered, that, in the meantime, all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed. Dated February 4th, 1891. W. C. VAN FLEET, Judge of the Superior Court. W. A. ANDERSON, Attorney for insolvent.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO.—In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to DAVID KIZER, greeting: You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 29th day of January, 1891, in which action, Annie Kizer is plaintiff, and you are defendant. That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To obtain a decree of said Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now and heretofore existing between plaintiff and defendant on the grounds of desertion and failure to provide; also, for the care, custody and control of the minor children, the issue of said marriage, viz: Nettie and Edna, aged 5 years, and 15 months respectively, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made; and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint. In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand [SEAL.] and affix the seal of said Court, this 29th day of January A. D. 1891. W. W. RHOADS, Clerk. By J. F. STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO.—In the Superior Court.—In the matter of the petition of W. C. Hays, an insolvent debtor. Upon reading and filing the petition, schedule and inventory of W. C. Hays, the above named petitioner, and on motion of L. S. Taylor, his attorney, it is ordered and declared that said petitioner is insolvent. And it is ordered that the Sheriff of the County of Sacramento do take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of said insolvent debtor (except such as may be by law exempt from execution), and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee. And all persons are forbidden to pay any debts to said debtor, or to deliver any property belonging to such debtor to him, or to any one for his use, and said debtor is forbidden to transfer any property to any one except said Sheriff. And it is further ordered that a meeting of all creditors of said debtor be held on Monday, the 9th day of March, 1891, at 10 o'clock A. M., at the court room of the Superior Court aforesaid, in the court house, in the City of Sacramento, to prove their debts, and choose one or more assignees of the estate; and that a copy of this order be published in the THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation, as often as said paper is published before the day set for the meeting of creditors. And all proceedings against the said insolvent are hereby stayed. Sacramento, January 23, 1891. A. P. CATLIN, Judge of the Superior Court.

How Sitting Bull Won Fame.

The recent killing of Sitting Bull in a conflict with the Indian police and a detachment of troops brings once more into prominence the recollection of his greatest achievement—the conduct of the campaign which culminated in what is known as the Custer massacre.

Sitting Bull was not what might, in the strict sense of the word, be called a war chief, but he possessed all the qualities save the fighting one, requisite for a leader. He camped his followers in the almost impregnable situation where the troops found them on the fatal 22d of June, 1876, and then retired to his tepee to "make medicine." He declared the medicine strong and good and foretold victory for the Sioux. Scarcely had his prophecy been uttered when Custer's five companies of soldiers rushed into the conflict, from which not a bluecoat came out alive.

It is asserted on good authority that in the actual struggle Sitting Bull took no part, but his previous speech and incantations "were worth 1,000 men." Including the losses suffered by Reno's defeated command, the whites had 267 men killed and 53 wounded. All the details of the Custer slaughter of course come from Indian sources, and these have been widely published and are still fresh in memory.

The exploit naturally gave Sitting Bull wide fame among his pale-faced foes and established his authority with the Sioux. Therefore he remained a power in the Dakota nation until a ball from Bull's Head's rifle put an end to his turbulent career.

She was smart and she was pretty, and her elders thought her witty, and she tripped the light fantastic like a fay.

She could read both French and Latin, and was sweet in print or satin, and 'twould make your bosom heave to hear her play.

But in single life she tarried, and she never, never married, and she'll doubtless be a maiden till she dies,

For she bade a proud defiance to the culinary science, and she never knew the mystery of pies.

It is said that the Confederate archives captured at the fall of Richmond and other Southern cities have saved the United States hundreds of thousands of dollars in the Court of Claims. No sooner does an alleged "loyal" Southerner file a petition asking for compensation for property taken or destroyed by Federal troops than an officer sets to work to hunt through these voluminous archives to find evidence to prove the "disloyalty" of the petitioner. Often the search is successful, and not infrequently it happens that the claimant is confronted with writings of his own which go to show that he was in full accord with the Confederate Government.

The equivalent, in English money, of $2,500 was once offered by an old lady in London for the return of a favorite cat which had strayed or been stolen. People called her a "crank," and perhaps she was. It is unfortunate that one of the gentler sex should ever gain this title, yet many do. It is, however, frequently not their fault. Often functional derangements will apparently change a woman's entire nature. Don't blame such sufferers if they are "cranky," but tell them to use Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, which is an infallible remedy for "female weaknesses."

"Favorite Prescription" has cured thousands of poor, bed-ridden suffering women of "female weakness," painful irregularities, ulcerations, organic displacements and kindred ailments too numerous to mention. It is the only medicine for women, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee that it will, in every case, give satisfaction or the price ($1.00) will be refunded.

Land of Ophir.

The belief has long prevailed that the enormous quantities of gold which contributed to the splendor of the reign of Solomon were brought from some part of South-east Africa. "And they came to Ophir and fetched from thence gold, four hundred and twenty talents, and brought it to King Solomon." Ophir was famous for its gold in the days of Job, who speaks of "laying up gold as dust, and the gold of Ophir as the stones of the brooks." Where was Ophir? Some say in Malacca; others have located it in India; others in Arabia, and not a few have contended for the southeast coast of Africa, about Sofala.

There has been much discussion on the subject, but the discussion has been profitless. The Sofala region of South Africa has as much to recommend it as any other. As told in the Bible, the story of the Queen of Sheba and the story of Ophir have a singular relation to each other, and seem to suggest that the location of the one was not far from the home of the other. In Solomon's time the round voyage to and from Ophir covered a period of three years. This has by some been considered fatal to the South African theory. When we consider the times, and take into account the difficulty of transport the objection loses much of its force. It is at least a remarkable circumstance that discoveries should now be made in the very region of South Africa so long favored by one set of traditions—discoveries which point unmistakably to very ancient occupation by a people advanced in the arts and industries of civilization, and also to the plentiful existence of gold in the region at one time, however it may be now.

Natural Mummification.

In the neighborhood of Lake Titicaca, in latitude 16 degrees south, is experienced the most withering, desiccating wind on the face of the earth. It is known as the Puna, which signifies a difficulty in breathing, and it fully justifies its appellation. It is confined to a table land about 500 miles broad by 100 long, situated between two chains of the Andes. The southeast trade wind passing across this chain deposits its moisture in snow and rain on the Brazilian side, and by the time it has passed the summit and is descending the western side it has become so intensely dry that dead animal and vegetable matter has no time to decay before it is mummified by the parching rigor of the blast. Men have to veil their faces from the fearful atmosphere. The whole region is a desolate wilderness, upon which, here and there, a tuft of withered herbage may be seen. Peruvians do not require to undergo a process of artificial embalment after death, as exposure on this plain effectually extracts every drop of moisture from the body. In one of the medical colleges of London there is a mummified body of a Peruvian preserved in this way which has been there for over sixty years. It is said that in another part of Peru, in the desert of Atacama, there is a cemetery in which the bodies are left above ground, as owing to the desiccating influence of the winds of that district they become naturally embalmed. Six hundred men, women and children, all in a perfect state of preservation, may be seen sitting arranged in a semicircle, gazing on vacancy, in this remarkable cemetery.

Nomenclature.

Many attempts have been made to ascertain the origin of the name Golden Gate as applied to the magnificent entrance to the harbor of San Francisco, but all without satisfactory results, few writers going beyond the appropriate naming Chrysopolis—the Golden Gate—by Fremont in his "Geographical Memoir of California," written in 1847, before the source of the golden streams, which have since flowed through it, was discovered. The name Sequoia, applied to the big trees of California, is said to have been given in honor of a Cherokee chieftain who was called Sequoyah. The meaning of the word is "He guessed it." "Shanty," also written "shantie," meaning a mean dwelling, appears to have been derived from the Irish "sean" (old) and "tig" (a house), though the Imperial Dictionary varies in this derivation that "shan" is from either "sean," meaning "old," or "sion," "weather." Again, in "Americanisms, Old and New," the word is said to have originated in Canada from the French "chantier," which word meant a workyard, as well as it does a shop or a shed.

"I think," said the cannibal jester to the three epicures who had assisted him in consuming a reverend tourist. "I think we should put the deceased down on our minute book as 'Ruling Passion.' He was so strong in death, you know." "Strong in death?" inquiringly remarked King Fo Fum, picking his teeth with a splinter of bone. "Yes," returned the jester, complacently patting his paunch. "It isn't it taken four of us to hold him?"—Boston Courier.

In the ten years after he passes thirty, a man's foot grows in length nearly an inch. In the case of a woman, however, her foot is generally smaller at twenty-five than it was when she was eighteen.
